Mr. VILAS, from the Committee on Claims, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1352) for the relief of August Leschinsky, have carefully considered the same, and, in accordance with the resolution of the Senate of February 7, 1884, report as follows:

Mr. VILAS. I am directed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2154) for the relief of the heirs of Joseph Nicholson Chambers, late a resident of the parish of East Feliciana, in the State of Louisiana, to report it adversely. DISTRICT PRODUCE DEALERS' LICENSE TAX.

Mr. PERKINS. I am directed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2460) to repeal the license tax of $25 per year now imposed upon produce dealers in the markets of the District of Columbia, to report it back favorably without amendment, and to submit a written report thereon. I make this report for the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], who has been called from the city. The bill is brief, and if there is no objection to it I should like to have it considered now. The District government is quite urgent about it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read for information only.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, That the annual corporation license tax of $25 per year, now imposed by an ordinance of the District of Columbia upon dealers in farmers' produce, such as butter and cheese, poultry, eggs, fruits, and vegetables, or any other articles of family provisions, in the markets of the District of Columbia, is hereby repealed, to take effect at the end of the present license year, April 1, 1892.

SEC. 2. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

Mr. PERKINS. I would say in explanation that under the existing law this tax must be paid before the 1st of May, and hence the necessity of an early consideration of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. None.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE GAMBLE.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to report back favorably a House concurrent resolution, and I ask for its present consideration.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the concurrent resolution; which was read, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring). That there be printed the eulogies delivered in Congress upon Hon. John R. Gamble, late a Representative from the State of South Dakota, 8,000 copies, of which number 2,000 shall be delivered to the Senators and Representatives of the State of South Dakota, which shall include 50 copies to be bound in full Morocco, to be delivered to the family of the deceased; and of those remaining, 2,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, and 4,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives; and the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to have engraved and printed a portrait of the said John R. Gamble to accompany said eulogies.

Mr. MANDERSON. The concurrent resolution is in accord with the later action of the two Houses, and is exactly the provision provided for in the general printing bill.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

POSTAL SAVINGS DEPOSITORIES.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to report a resolution, and I ask that it be now considered.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the argument of the Postmaster-General on the subject of postal savings depositories, addressed to the chairman of the Senate Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, be printed, and that there be printed 3,000 additional copies, 1,000 of which shall be for the Senate and 2,000 for distribution by the Postmaster-General.

Mr. MANDERSON. This is a very important and valuable compilation of the custom that obtains in foreign countries with reference to postal savings banks, and also an argument with reference to that subject-matter made by the Postmaster-General and addressed by him to the chairman of the Senate Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. That committee recommend the printing of the document in this number. I find that the cost of it will be trifling, under $300, and it certainly is a matter of sufficient importance to receive this consideration.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

LIST OF CONGRESSIONAL DOCUMENTS.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to report a concurrent resolution to print additional copies of the list of Congressional documents, and I ask for its present consideration.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the concurrent resolution; which was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That 2,000 copies of the list of Congressional documents prepared by the superintendent of documents, Department of the Interior, be printed and delivered to that officer, of which he shall supply 2 copies to each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in Congress, and the remainder shall be distributed to public and other libraries.

Mr. MANDERSON. This document contains in very compact form a complete list of all Government publications from the Fifteenth to the Fifty-first Congress, inclusive. The cost is trifling to print it in this number, and it is, I think, of very great importance that it should be printed.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

Mr. PERKINS introduced a bill (S. 2960) granting an honorable discharge to Bury J. O'Brien; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2961) granting a pension to Lydia Ferris; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2962) granting a pension to Mary Cochran; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2963) granting a pension to Elizabeth Breshear; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. KYLE (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2964) to establish a composite dollar; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. DUBOIS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GRAY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HIGGINS submitted six amendments intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the concurrent resolution of the Senate to print 35,000 copies of the annual report of the Commissioner of Labor relating to cost of production, earnings, efficiency of labor, and cost of living.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 7093) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893, and for other purposes; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (H. R. 4429) to empower the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to grant respites and pardons in certain cases;

A bill (H. R. 5978) to extend the time for making an assessment of real estate in the District of Columbia outside the cities of Washington and Georgetown; and

A bill (H. R. 6288) to amend the charter of the Rock Creek Railroad Company.

DELAWARE AND REHOBOTH BAYS.

Mr. HIGGINS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to furnish the Senate with copies of the correspondence of the Congressional delegation of Delaware and the War Department, together with copies of reports of December 18, 1891, and February 4, 1892, with inclosures from W. F. Smith, United States Army, Major of Engineers, retired, all in relation to the location of the proposed waterway between Delaware Bay and Rehoboth Bay, on line of the inland waterway between Chincoteague Bay and Delaware Bay.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 7093) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PUBLICATION OF COPYRIGHTED BOOKS IN THE RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day relative to infringement of copyright by the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. SANDERS, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire whether the publication in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, without the consent of the proprietor, of a copyrighted book is an infringement of the right granted to such proprietor of the sole liberty of printing, reprinting, publishing, completing, copying, executing, finishing, or vending the same, and whether the publication therein subjects any person who shall sell or expose to sale the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD containing such reprint to the penalties prescribed in section 4964 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and whether any person is liable to the owner of such copyright book for damages for such publication; and if so, what person, and what action, if any, is desirable to be taken in view of the publication of copyrighted books in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD; and that said committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. CHANDLER. I suggest to the Senator from Montana to make the instruction to the Committee on Patents instead of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to ask the Senator from Montana whether he desires the passage of the resolution now? I have not examined the RECORD this morning, but I think there is to be found in the RECORD action by the other branch (and I suppose it is not improper to speak of anything that is in the RECORD) by which the practice which has prevailed of inserting documents, books, and all that kind of matter in the RECORD has been stopped by action of the other branch of the Legislature. Therefore I ask whether the Senator desires to pursue the matter suggested by his resolution.

Mr. SANDERS. Mr. President—

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator allow me a word?

Mr. SANDERS. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not understand that any action has been taken that strikes out from the RECORD the half dozen volumes that have been put into it within the last two weeks, nor does it prohibit the reestablishment of the practice at any moment when an attempt may be made to reestablish it. It seems to me the resolution is a wise one, in order to determine once for all whether that thing shall be done, not merely in the past but in the future, and it is just as likely to be done hereafter as has already been the case.

Mr. PLATT. I do not want to oppose the resolution if the Senator who introduced it or other Senators think that there is necessity for it since the action of the other branch of the Legislature in regard to such matters.

Mr. WILSON. I think that this is a matter of some importance and that it ought to be considered by a committee. I therefore move to refer the resolution to the Committee on Patents, so that that committee may consider the subject and report.

Mr. McPHERSON. I should like to have the resolution again read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be again read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion to refer the resolution to the committee on Patents.

Mr. SANDERS. Mr. President, this resolution is a search after abstract truth, but it is a search after a truth which concerns the Senate; and as nothing in the resolution has reference to the other House, I see no reason why we should not pursue this inquiry, for we are already encumbered in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD with the publication of several books, the property in which is in citizens of the United States. It seems to me that before the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD shall be put into a permanent form we should know whether the publication of it is in violation of rights that we have secured by law, and if such publication is, those books, however poetic they may be, can be expunged from the RECORD and the citizens of the United States can be informed whether by selling a copy of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD they incur the penalties which are denounced against literary piracy.

I think the information sought for by the resolution is not useless and has not been superseded by any discontinuance of the policy that has heretofore been maintained by any class of men or body of men. I am particularly anxious for the information myself, because if it shall be affirmed that it is the right of Senators to print copyrighted books, I wish to make some selections out of the libraries and spread them before the people of the United States, they being books which, in my judgment, are useful to be comprehended and understood. I do not know of any cheaper way than the way indicated, provided it shall be determined by our Judiciary Committee that this is proper.

Besides that, there is a large number of people, very excellent of character and very disappointed in their expectations, who have been guilty of divers and sundry copyrighted noncirculative books, and how can the circulation of those books be more easily forced than by republishing them in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD?

I think the resolution should pass, but I am somewhat indifferent as to the committee to which it should go.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Patents.

The motion was agreed to.

IRRIGATION PUBLICATIONS OF GEOLOGICAL SURVEY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. POWER April 19, 1892, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, directed to furnish the Senate with information in relation to the following matters and at as early a date as practicable:

1. What documents, reports, monographs, papers, maps, and illustrations have been printed during the fiscal years of 1890-91 and 1891-92 for the United States Geological Survey in relation to irrigation, the storage of water, the measuring of streams, the construction and character of works in this and other countries, the survey of arid lands for reclamation purposes; also if any have been printed in previous years, not already published and distributed; and, if so, what relation such reports, etc., bear to the annual and special publications of the Geological Survey, as authorized by law, and at what date (if any such documents are now printed or printing) will they be ready for distribution?

2. What reports relating to arid-land reclamation and irrigation are in preparation in the offices of the United States Geological Survey and the United States Census; whether the same are now in course of printing; by whom are such reports being prepared, and under what authority of law; from what appropriations are the costs of said reports, papers, etc., being borne, and from what rolls are the persons employed thereat being paid, with a full statement or estimate of the cost of each of such publications or documents, both for preparation and printing, with the number to be printed and specific authority under which the work is being or has been done.

3. That the information asked shall include a statement as to whether any portion, and if so, what portions, of said reports, etc., have been previously published and circulated, either public or private papers and reports; also as to the authority of law under which such data have been gathered, the names and duties of those employed to obtain and prepare the same, the rolls on which they are now or were borne and paid, the amount of the payments to them while so employed, and the offices or divisions to which they were assigned.

Mr. HALE. That resolution was read in full yesterday. I objected to it and it went over. I have since examined it and am in favor of it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If the morning business is concluded, the Calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 8001) to authorize a national bank at Chicago, Ill., to establish a branch office upon the grounds of the World's Columbian Exposition; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (S. 113) to establish a military post near Little Rock, Ark.; and

A bill (S. 1492) to authorize the appointment of an inspector of plumbing in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

EXCLUSION OF CHINESE.

Mr. TELLER. If agreeable to the Senate, I should like to call up the resolutions introduced some time since by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] touching the silver question, for the purpose of submitting some remarks thereon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays the resolutions before the Senate.

Mr. TELLER. I do not desire to interfere with any business of the Senate, but this seems to me to be as favorable an opportunity as I shall get.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to interpose if the Senator will allow me a few moments to give the state of the law in regard to the Chinese question.

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. SHERMAN. I gave notice that I would call up the bill reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations in respect of Chinese immigration. At that time the committee were of the opinion, or seemed to be, without any very careful examination of the law, that the present law for the exclusion of Chinese immigration would expire on the 6th of May of the present year. By a more careful investigation, and by examining the amendments which have been made to the act of May 6, 1882, I became entirely satisfied that the act of 1884 extended the time two years, so that the law prohibiting Chinese immigration does not expire until some time in July, 1894. Therefore there is no immediate pressure to urge the passage of the bill reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations. Certain Senators desire to speak upon the subject, however, and at some time when it is convenient to them I shall call the bill up, but not to-day.

THE FINANCIAL SYSTEM.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair has recognized the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] as entitled to the floor on the resolution heretofore submitted by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN].

Mr. WILSON. Unless the Senator from Colorado is anxious to proceed now, I should like to suggest that we occupy this morning on the Calendar until 2 o'clock. The Calendar is increasing.

Mr. TELLER. I should prefer, if I am to speak at all, to speak now.

Mr. WILSON. The Calendar is increasing every day.

Mr. TELLER. Of course, if the Senator objects I shall not speak.

Mr. WILSON. I shall not go to that extent, but I merely make the suggestion that it would be well to have the Calendar considered until 2 o'clock.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I suppose, in the condition in which the friends of bimetalism find themselves to-day in this country, perhaps I should apologize to the Senate for taking its time from the Calendar, touching unimportant and trifling bills, which pass this body from year to year to die somewhere else. A subject that touches every human being in civilized society, a subject which comes home to every American citizen with peculiar force and peculiar interest, would, in ordinary times and under ordinary circumstances, scarcely require an apology from a member of the Senate who flatters himself at least that he has given it honest thought and honest study, which he believes to be the duty of every American Senator on this, in his judgment, the most important question which has been presented to the American public since the close of the war.

But, Mr. President, we have fallen upon evil times. We have felt the great power, the tremendous influence of political and partisan attachments and political and party relations. We are told now that the question which, I repeat, touches every living man in civilized society, which affects his welfare, his prosperity, is not of so much importance and consideration as it is to have a certain man of one political party or the other elected for the ensuing four years as Chief Executive. We have felt that influence here. We have felt it in other places which the proprieties of debate and the relation which should exist between the two legislative branches of this great Government prevent me from characterizing or speaking of in terms which I should like to employ.

There is no one who does not know that in the election of 1890 the voice of the American people was heard with peculiar strength and with peculiar clearness and with peculiar emphasis upon the question of the use of silver as money in this country. It elected a Democratic House largely from Republican districts, districts which had never sent a Democrat to Congress, revolutionized the condition of affairs, and sent Democrats there mainly on this question. I know that now it is the fashion to say, and especially on this side of the Chamber, that it was because of certain tariff legislation which was not then understood, and which it is asserted now has become very popular, commonly called the McKinley bill.

Mr. President, I assert here, and I believe the consensus of opinion of those who examine this subject will bear me out, that that was not a revolt against tariff legislation; it was a revolt of the people against the currency legislation of this country. Of course just what force has created this great revolution will always be a question of doubt, because you can not determine those questions with absolute certainty; but does anybody deny—and if anybody here will challenge the statement I am about to make, I will with pleasure wait to hear upon what ground—does anybody deny that a great majority of the House of Representatives as elected were known to be in favor of the use of silver to the utmost and unlimited extent ever proposed by anyone in this body or in the other? A two-thirds vote when that House assembled, untouched and uninfluenced by the considerations of which I have spoken, was in favor of the free and unlimited coinage of silver in this country.

Mr. President, on two occasions this Senate, practically the same now as then, by decided majorities declared in favor of the free and unlimited coinage of silver, 42 votes in favor to 25 against. Is it possible that the American Senate has changed its views on this subject? Is it possible that the men fresh from their constituents who announced that they were in favor of the free coinage of silver have changed their views? Is it not apparent that some agency or some cause has arisen since to affect their conduct and to, for a time at least, compel them to suspend the execution of what they declared when they were elected was the will of their constituents?

What are the agencies? First—and I mention that first because I think that it has been the most powerful agency—the executive department of this Government for three years under the present Executive has been hostile to the scheme. I do not say it is more hostile than its predecessor. I need not dilate nor expatiate upon this subject, nor need I produce the proof unless somebody challenges the assertion, and when anyone does I will produce the proof. The newspapers everywhere which represent the Executive have declared that they spoke with authority when they said he was prepared to and would veto a free-coinage bill. In another place the representatives of the President, in sympathy with him politically and seeking his renomination, did not hesitate to speak with authority and say that the President of the United States would veto the bill which it was then thought was surely to pass.

The great metropolitan journals of the Republican party have made it the principal claim for the renomination of the present incumbent, that he stood "like a wall" against the wishes of the House and the Senate on this question of finance, and that while the people might get wild, and while even the American Senate, supposed to be the most conservative body in the world, free from extraneous influences, more independent in its action than any other body—when it, too, lost judgment and went for free coinage, the President, with greater patriotism, with greater intelligence, with greater devotion to the interests of the country, stood as the safeguard to Wall street and the money bags of that region.

So no man can deny when I say here the Executive influence during the last year has been the potent influence which has controlled the party which has professedly, at least, been friendly to silver, so that it rallied, when the crisis came and the opportunity to put itself on record arrived, one-tenth of its members in another place!

Mr. President, I have been for fifteen years the humiliated observer of the power of Federal patronage upon people, outside at least. It might not be becoming in me to say that I am more independent than my fellows, more uninfluenced by these considerations ordinarily than others. I believe we are all more or less susceptible to such influence. I am only now speaking of the fact that the influence exists and has been exerted, and the dire effects have been seen in the lack of proper legislation.

Another influence has been brought to bear. It is said the Republican party as a party can not commit itself to free coinage; that it can not commit itself to a liberal silver policy. Why? Because the great State of New York, with more electoral votes than any other, with a greater population and greater wealth, is the State that we are contending for in every Presidential election, and that a liberal policy touching the silver question, especially free coinage, would be detrimental to the interests of the party in that State, and we can not afford to antagonize that sentiment. So, the interests of the country, the interests of the great West and the Northwest, which, as I shall attempt to show before I get through, independent of the States producing silver, are particularly interested in this question, go for nothing that a political party may continue in control.

On the other hand, the Democratic party with equal zeal are contending for the great State of New York. In a Democratic House, where uninfluenced—if it is proper for me thus to speak—there would have been a vote sufficient to pass the bill over the veto of the President, it lacks to-day a majority because the Democratic party were afraid that if the Democrats in that body put themselves squarely on record on the question of free coinage, approving it, the State of New York would cast its vote for the Republican party.

Sir, I understand the power of patronage and party prejudice, and party zeal. When the free-coinage bill was introduced in this body in December, I know whereof I speak when I say that the banks of New York City organized themselves for the purpose of defeating this legislation, and I venture to say now there is not a bank in the United States known as a national bank which has not been appealed to by that organization to contribute funds and influence to the defeat of silver legislation.

I know when the bill was before the House that telegrams from bankers, telegrams from brokers, telegrams from chambers of commerce and boards of trade were piled in upon the members, petitions were presented, and we were told that if this legislation took place there would be dire disaster, when every one of those petitioners knew that there was no probability of the bill becoming a law, when they knew they had in the Executive chair now, as they had during the last Administration, a friend who would brave public sentiment and the wishes and wants of the people to please them.

Why were they so solicitous? Why were they so anxious? Not about the passage of the bill. The chief opponents of the bill in the House stood there declaring that they had assurances that if the bill passed the House and the Senate it would never become a law. Oh, Mr. President, this is not a fight which is confined to America. This is not a contest in which the American people are alone engaged; it is as wide as the world.

The United States is the greatest nation to-day in the world, without exception. Russia, in numbers is greater, but in wealth we are greater than Russia; in strength we have no equal. The influence of this nation upon the continent of Europe touching silver is more potent than even that of Great Britain. It was to prevent the expression by the representatives of the American people of a friendliness to silver which brought about this great effort. That is why the banks organized, that is why consolidated capital made this effort here with a lobby which in number and in strength I declare has had no parallel since I have been in public life. If you can prevent the American people from declaring in favor of bimetallicism, practical bimetallicism—not bimetallicism merely by resolution, but practical bimetallicism—you can probably prevent Europe from returning to bimetallicism. That is the reason why the contest was made, and that is what the fight was for.

Mr. President, some of our friends have been surprised and some of them have been discouraged. Allow me to say for myself that I was neither surprised nor am I discouraged. I knew that whenever it appeared to the class of men who have been the opponents of silver in this country—and they are insignificant in number, but great in influence and power—I knew that when the time approached when they thought what we were doing would have its effect, not in bringing free coinage here, but in encouraging and stimulating bimetallism abroad, we should be met with just such opposition as we have encountered.

Does anybody suppose that the men who hold the credits of the world, so great in amount that I dare not mention them, for they are beyond the comprehension of ordinary men—does anybody suppose the men who hold those credits, and who take, by reason of the present condition of affairs financially in this country and in the world, 30 per cent more, nay, more than that, nearly 40 per cent more, from the people who owe these debts than they would under a proper system of currency, will tamely and quietly surrender the advantage which they secured by so much effort and so much labor? They will appeal to our fears, to our cupidity, and to our partisan attachments, and if there are other methods to which they can resort they will be sure to use them.

Mr. President, it is organized capital against the unorganized productive energies of the people. Capital will make itself felt. Why? Because it has a grip and a grasp through these credits upon the great productive energies of this country and the world. If anybody who has observed believes that the hand of greed with its grasp will unlock it in the interest of the masses, he is mistaken. They will unlock it only when we have in the executive chair of this country and in both Houses of Congress men who are in sympathy with the toiling millions of men who are suffering by reason of the false system of American finance, a system that is not peculiar to this country. Can any man tell me why for eighteen consecutive years in free democratic America, in despot Russia, in liberal France, in liberal England, in all the countries of the world, the prices of commodities have been year by year going lower and lower? "Oh!" say they, "it is cheaper production; it is cheaper transportation; it is overproduction." Ah, Mr. President, it does not make any difference whether the article is produced cheaply or dearly, the same inflexible rule applies to it, and down it goes.

I do not care to dilate at great length upon this subject. I did not rise this morning to make an extended speech, but I want to touch on one or two other things, and then I shall leave the subject, but before this debate closes I shall return to it again.

I will only add touching the fall of prices, that the wheat crop this year amounts to 611,000,000 bushels, 125,000,000 bushels more than the crop of 1880, after we had put ourselves on a specie-paying basis. More than 200,000,000 of it have gone to Europe; there are 15,000,000 more American mouths to feed, and yet the wheat crop of the United States with a short crop in Europe, with famine in Russia brings very many millions of dollars less than the comparatively short crop in 1880.

Mr. WASHBURN. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me to interrupt him—

Mr. TELLER. It will not interrupt me; go on, sir.

Mr. WASHBURN. I would ask why the same reason for the low prices of wheat would not have existed six months ago, after the crop was harvested as now? Wheat, you understand, is now something like 25 cents a bushel less than it was for three months after it was harvested.

Mr. TELLER. I think the Senator could have answered that better even than I can answer it, but I can answer it. Last fall after the wheat crop was harvested it was reported that there was a shortage very much in excess of what turned out to be true. It was supposed that Russia had no wheat whatever for export, and yet Russia has sent this last year into the markets of the world 100,000,000 bushels of wheat.

Another agency in putting up the price of wheat, as the Senator will recognize, is the peculiar condition of affairs at Chicago with reference to dealing in wheat. I think he will not deny that the condition there had much to do with temporarily putting up the price of wheat.

Mr. WASHBURN. Not so much as putting down the price of wheat later.

Mr. TELLER. I have not gotten through.

Mr. WASHBURN. I asked the Senator a question which I regarded as very pertinent, but the reasons for the decline in the price of wheat are not based on the silver question.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I will touch that. What I am trying now to show is that there has been a falling in the prices of all commodities. I am not now referring to the question of the particular fall of wheat prices, but I will touch on that before I get through if my voice does not fail me.

I want to impress on the Senator from Minnesota that there is nothing in the range of human production, whether it be cotton goods or a thrashing machine, that has not depreciated in price more than 30 per cent in eighteen years. I want to impress upon him also that in this great American Republic, with its millions of farms, there is not a farm to-day, unless it is where the influences of town growth may have changed results—there is not a farm in the older sections of this country which is worth as much to-day as it was eighteen or twenty years ago. Of course this does not apply to the new lands recently entered and recently taken from the Government, because there the communities have grown and land has increased in value; but I mean to say that in the State of Massachusetts, in the State of New York, in the State of Delaware, and in the State of Illinois the farms are not as valuable as they were twenty years ago. I selected wheat as an illustration; I might have taken corn and cotton and hay and cattle, and all other things produced by human hands.

I do not intend to spend much time on the question of the peculiar influence of silver upon wheat, because I proposed when I rose to leave that for another occasion; but since the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WASHBURN], who represents the State which I believe produced more wheat last year than any other State in the Union, and whose people have more interest in the silver question than the people of Colorado, has asked a question about it, I will illustrate how it is.

In the year 1873, when silver was demonetized, India for the first time sent wheat to the European market; she sent then 290,000 bushels. This year, in eleven months, she has sent 50,000,000 bushels of wheat to compete with the wheat-growers on American soil. At the time silver was demonetized here, Russia had never put into the markets of the world more than twenty-five or twenty-six million bushels of wheat. In less than six months now, with a famine in one-third of her land, she has put 100,000,000 bushels of wheat in Europe.

India had never sent any wheat; she never could send any wheat while silver was at par. Russia had never sent much wheat. She labored under disadvantages.

Mr. HIGGINS. Will the Senator yield to me for a question? Mr. TELLER. I will in a moment.

She labored under disadvantages. Russia is a paper country, nominally bimetallic, but in fact with an irredeemable paper currency; consequently the silver that went to Russia went there just as metal came here during the war and was sold at a premium.

Mr. STEWART. The silver rouble is the unit of value there.

Mr. TELLER. And in that way we have stimulated these two countries to send 150,000,000 bushels of wheat to Europe—and to that extent—to destroy the market for American wheat.

South America, which had never up to 1873 been a competitor with us in wheat, has become a great competitor with us in wheat for the same identical reason that the South American countries are on a silver basis, and silver in many sections of South America is to-day at a premium over their paper.

The Senator from Delaware desired to ask me a question, and now I will hear him.

Mr. HIGGINS. I wanted to ask the Senator if it was not the fact that in 1873, when silver was demonetized in this country, there was a lack of sufficient railroad facilities in India for the wheat to get from the country where it was grown to market, so that for that reason, even if a different state of things financially had existed, could they have sent wheat abroad at that time?

Mr. TELLER. It is possible that they could not have sent it abroad at that time even with silver at present prices, but it is notoriously true, as the Senator must know, that they could not send it to-day if silver were worth $1.29.

Mr. HIGGINS. That is another question.

Mr. TELLER. A Senator asks me where they got the money with which to build the railroads. Great Britain built the railroads for them.

Mr. STEWART. And charged it to them.

Mr. TELLER. Of course India is paying for them. The financial policy of Great Britain has been to never pay anything out to anybody where she does not get a full equivalent back.

Mr. President, we have a low price for cotton in this country, and it has been growing lower and lower year by year. The cotton-growing regions, which are the agricultural regions of this country, along and relating closely to the great Mississippi Valley country, are desirable sections of country so far as we are nationally concerned, and they have produced for many years a vast amount of our exports. They have brought into this country in exchange for the cotton untold millions of gold—if that is a blessing, and I think it is. They are to-day suffering from low prices. Undoubtedly they are suffering somewhat from overproduction, but they are also suffering from underconsumption. That is the great trouble.

India under this system of finance has increased her output of cotton. India, which was not a competitor with any country in the export of cotton until since this question of silver came before the public, has become a decided competitor with us in the country that used the great bulk of American cotton—Great Britain. Eighty millions of raw cotton was exported last year from India. I believe a little of it struck this continent, but not enough to affect us. The most of it went to England, and went there to the exclusion of American cotton. About $35,000,000 worth of manufactures of cotton went mostly to China, and destroyed the British market, or at least lessened the sales there, and thus crippled our market for cotton in England.

I have here before me the London Economist of April 2, in which it is declared that for the last quarter the consumption of cotton in Great Britain was 13 per cent less than it was for the corresponding quarter the year before.

Mr. GRAY. May I ask the Senator a question, entirely for my own information?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. GRAY. I ask the Senator whether he will explain, if it does not take him aside from the line of his argument, what the mechanism of the process is by which the vitiation of silver has brought the large export of wheat from India in competition with the grain grown in the United States?

Mr. TELLER. I will explain that to the Senator, and it is not difficult of explanation. I will take as an illustration the price of silver to be 90 cents an ounce. It costs to ship wheat from Bombay, Calcutta, and other places in India, to Great Britain just about twice what it costs us to ship it from New York. It passes through a region of country hot and unhealthy even for wheat, and when it reaches Great Britain it is not the best of wheat, and not as good as ours, but it comes in competition and fixes the price of American wheat. Now, let us see how it is done. The Indiashipper can buy wheat for $1.20 a bushel, and he can send it to Great Britain and sell it for 90 cents a bushel and make money. The American, who sends his wheat to Great Britain and sells it for 90 cents a bushel, gets 90 cents and no more.

The English shipper, who takes it from India to Great Britain and sells it, gets gold for it. He takes that 90 cents and buys an ounce and a third of an ounce of silver. That costs him $1.20. What does he do with that silver? He takes it back and puts it into rupees at $1.38 an ounce. He has got from $1.84 to $1.85 for his wheat, while the American wheat-grower, owing to this beautiful system of finance of ours, has got his 90 cents. He gets a little more than that, for wheat has been worth a little more than 90 cents. I only use this as an illustration.

Does the Senator understand now how that is done? If not, I will explain further.

Mr. GRAY. I should like to have the Senator explain further.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator does not see it yet. Let him take his pencil and a tablet; let him put down the price of wheat in Bombay at $1.20; let him add to it the 14 cents, the cost of transportation, and he has got $1.34. That is what it will cost when it gets to England, and he realizes $1.84 or $1.85, according to the market price of silver, for his wheat. Can the Senator make the subtraction of $1.34 from $1.85 and find a fair margin for the Indian exporter?

Mr. GRAY. I do not want to interrupt the Senator, but in both cases, both for the bushel of wheat shipped from this country and the bushel of wheat shipped from India, the producer is paid in London or in Liverpool in gold, is he not?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly, and if the American wheat-grower buys silver he brings it back here, and it is still at the same price it was when he got it in London, and it will not buy any more than his 90 cents of gold. But if the Indian merchant takes it back to India it buys as much, ounce for ounce, whether it is in coin or in bullion, as it did thirty years ago. That is, the purchasing power of an ounce of silver is in India $1.38, and it has cost him 90 cents.

Mr. GRAY. I will ask the Senator whether the 90 cents which the American grower gets for his wheat in Liverpool when it comes back here is not equivalent to 90 cents in gold?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly it is.

Mr. GRAY. Then, what right has he to complain?

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, he is so stupid in this country that he does not complain. [Laughter.] The American wheat-growers have sat by and clapped their hands for both of these great political parties who have been cutting their throats. They will complain after awhile. But still the fact is, our producer has for his bushel of wheat 90 cents and the Indian has for his $1.84 to $1.85, Liverpool price, in silver.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask the Senator from Colorado if the same principle does not apply to the price of cotton?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly. I shall come to that in a moment.

Mr. President, I hope to make this so plain that the Senator from Delaware can see it. When he realizes that the rupee in which they put the silver—and it does not make any difference whether it is in the rupee or whether it is in the bullion bar, because, the mint being open, practically the bar is of the same value as the rupee—when they take that, they go out and they buy wheat that has not risen in price. Wheat has not risen in India. In this country if you should attempt to buy in silver bullion you would find that there was such a divergence between your bullion and your wheat that you could not make a profit, but there is no such thing in India.

Take cotton. The price of cotton in Liverpool governs the price of cotton, of course, in the United States. The Indian exporter of cotton puts his cotton into Liverpool and takes his pay in gold at 90 cents an ounce, and when he goes back and buys cotton with it he buys it at $1.38 an ounce. That is the purchasing power of his 90 cents in gold converted into silver.

The Senator from Delaware may challenge the statement, as I heard it often challenged, that silver in India has the same purchasing power now that it had thirty years ago. If he does, I am prepared to show by a recent article from a London financial paper that the facts are as I state.

Mr. GRAY. I do not challenge the statement at all. I am groping somewhat in the dark, and I was quite sincere when I asked the Senator a question for information, but really the answer that he gave to me would seem to have this corollary, that it would be necessary, in order that the American farmer should realize the profit that the Indian farmer realizes on the sale of his wheat, that we should have a disparity in the purchasing power of gold and silver.

Mr. TELLER. Oh, Mr. President—

Mr. GRAY. I am sorry to provoke the impatience of the Senator.

Mr. TELLER. I suppose I ought not to be provoked to impatience. Have I said anything that can be tortured by any fair man into such a suggestion? I have simply undertaken to deal with a plain undisputed fact that a 10-year-old boy could understand, and I know the Senator from Delaware does.

Mr. GRAY. If I have come under the disapprobation of the Senator I am sorry.

Mr. TELLER. I simply said that while this condition of affairs exists the American wheat-grower is put on an unfair basis. He sells his wheat for 90 cents and the other man sells his for $1.38, and the purchasing power of the $1.38 is exactly 48 units more than the purchasing power of the 90 cents.

Mr. GRAY. I beg the Senator will not think that it is for the sake of interruption that I ask the question that I am about to ask him. I am not doing it for the sake of exploiting my superior knowledge; on the contrary, I am afraid I shall be exploiting my superior ignorance. I will ask this question for my own information: Is the practical ratio of silver to gold in India that of 16 to 1?

Mr. TELLER. The Senator from Delaware has been, as I know, asserting himself to be an authority on this subject for several years.

Mr. GRAY. I beg the Senator's pardon; I have not.

Mr. TELLER. Then I have been mistaken, because I have heard the Senator several times vote against free coinage, and I remember some speeches that the Senator made on this floor against free coinage, and yet the Senator does not know what the ratio is between gold and silver in India! It is 15 to 1. A study of this question necessitates some knowledge of the relation of gold and silver in the different countries of the world.

Now, I desire to get back to cotton. Before silver was demonetized there was practically no export of India cotton. That has grown up because the condition applied precisely to cotton which is applied to wheat, and applied also to India corn, which, for the first time in the history of India, is being raised in that country to a considerable degree, and if this condition of affairs continues we shall not only lose the cotton trade, but we shall lose the wheat trade and the corn trade.

I call attention to the fact that the exports of cotton from India amounted to $80,000,000 last year, and manufactured cotton to thirty-five or forty millions more, mostly to China, but not all. That, I say, deprived either England or the United States of that market, and thus it is that 13 per cent less of cotton was used during the last quarter than was used the corresponding quarter the year before.

Let me call attention for a moment to a statement made in a public meeting in the city of Manchester a few years since. The people of Manchester, in Great Britain, are all free-coinage men. So they are in Lancashire. They do not count much; they do not really have much more influence than the American farmer has in this country—very little more. The people who have the money and who are taking toll of all industries treat them just as the people of this country who have the money and who are taking toll from the industries of our country treat the producers in this country; but, nevertheless, they have the right of free speech there as we have in this country, and they speak out and they tell what their complaint is, and here is a little of it:

We find that for the first time in the history of the cotton trade competition has grown up, which is seriously displacing a portion of Lancashire industry. That displacement has become so great that I have no hesitation in saying that it amounts in wages alone over the district of southeast Lancashire to £1,000,000 per annum.

These wage-earners are the men who are manufacturing American cotton.

This loss of industry, traced to this question of the operation of silver in relation to gold, is clearly shown to have made a loss to industry during the last ten years of £1,000,000 per annum in wages. Now, the markets of China and Japan were in this position eleven years ago. We exported from this country to those markets 29,000,000 pounds weight of yarn per annum.

I desire to attract the attention of Senators whose people are raising cotton to this statement. Let me repeat it:

We exported from this country to those markets—

That is, China and Japan—

29,000,000 pounds weight of yarn per annum. At that time there was competition from the Bombay mills, but it was a much less annual export than ours. They sent to the same markets about 8,000,000 of heavy coarse yarn, as against our 29,000,000. We find that ever since these great variations of exchange set in during the last eleven years, trade between the Bombay mills—

This was in 1887—

trade between the Bombay mills and these Eastern markets has grown up to 100,000,000 pounds—

From 8,000,000 pounds to 100,000,000 pounds per annum.

Mr. STEWART. And it has increased enormously since.

Mr. TELLER. This statement was made in 1887, and the increase has been even greater since than before. Now, let us see how Great Britain increased her output of cotton yarn. To continue the quotation:

The growth between these Indian mills and the farther East is thirteenfold in eleven years, and in our case it has diminished from 29,000,000 to 26,000,000 pounds.

Mr. President, the cotton-growers of the South can see where their market for cotton has gone. Great Britain ought, in the nature of things, to increase equally with India. India increased thirteenfold. Great Britain lost from 29,000,000 pounds to 26,000,000 pounds.

It would be a very proper thing to inquire whether there is anything in the productive power of the Bombay mills to account for this change. Of course the fact is that they have a cheaper rate of labor.

That is what I call the attention of the American wheat-grower to. The foreign producer has cheaper labor than the American wheat-grower, whether he does the labor with his own hands or hires his neighbors sons to do it for him.

But when you take the cost of mills or of working expenses and effective labor, and when you take what is actually paid for labor, a pound of yarn costs more to-day there than the same pound does here. How is it that the cheaper producer is being displaced by the dearer producer?

That is what he asks.

It is clear when we sell a bale of yarn, and we sell it in Shanghai or Hongkong, at a dollar—say, worth 4s. 6d.—

He sells it for silver in China—when exchanged into gold money it comes down to 3s. 1d.

That explains how the dearer producer is driving the cheaper producer out of the market. If the Senator from Delaware who does me the honor to listen does not understand that system of finance I will give him an opportunity to look at this article, and I think when he has completed the investigation he will thoroughly understand it.

Mr. GRAY. Is it not because of the disparity between the legal value and the bullion value of silver?

Mr. TELLER. It is because of the disparity between gold and silver in England and because in China silver still maintains its purchasing power as of old. Does not the Senator know that more than one thousand two hundred millions of the human race are using silver at a ratio that makes it worth $1.30 an ounce or more in those countries?

Mr. GRAY. That is the question I asked awhile ago, and I do not think the Senator comprehended it or he would not have answered me in the way he did.

Mr. TELLER. I hope I did not answer the Senator offensively.

Mr. GRAY. Not offensively; but instead of answering my question I think the Senator put me in a false position.

Mr. TELLER. Oh, no; I did not mean to do that.

Mr. GRAY. Was it not the same reason, let me ask the Senator, that made the difference in India in the price of wheat, that the bullion value of silver was less than the legal or lawful value?

Mr. TELLER. No; the bullion value in India is the mint value.

Mr. GRAY. The mint value, I mean. That is the proper term.

Mr. TELLER. The bullion value in China is the mint value. They have only had a mint in China about two years.

Mr. GRAY. I mean relatively with gold.

Mr. TELLER. They do not use gold. That is the trouble. The whole country is on a silver basis, and it is on exactly the same silver basis it was thirty years ago. When silver depreciates goods rise in value. It has not depreciated, and the goods have not risen in value in India or China and other silver-using countries.

Mr. BUTLER. We come in competition with them. There is the evil.

Mr. TELLER. It is all explained here. They go to China. They sell a bale of yarn for 4s. and 6d. That is paid in silver, because that is the only currency there, and you have to get it in silver if you trade with them. Now, when you have that 4s. and 6d. you can not use that 4s. and 6d. in silver in Great Britain or the United States. You must put it into gold, and then it is 3s. and 1 penny. There is the difference. One shilling and 5d. on every bale of yarn is the premium that the India producer gets over the producer in Great Britain, and of course he can afford to produce it at a greater cost because he sells it at a greater price, because the silver to him is the same thing that it was one hundred years ago.

So, we are building up a competition in cotton, in wheat, in manufactured goods, and we are building it up for the benefit of the Indian and the English Government, and not for our own benefit. This speaker from whom I have quoted continues and says it is a bonus of 30 per cent. "And this is the complaint of the Manchester manufacturing people." This is the complaint also of the Lancashire manufacturer. This ought to be the complaint of the American wheat-grower. He ought to be presented on this floor and everywhere else by men who are willing to give to this question study and thought. It touches him, it comes home to him in his cabin, it determines the question of his ability to remove the mortgage on his farm; and if he continues much longer to adhere to his political traditions simply because they are traditions, I shall be greatly mistaken. He can have redress. Whenever you can put silver to par he can secure relief, and he will never get it until that is done.

Fifty million bushels of wheat from India this year, 100,000,000 bushels next, 200,000,000 bushels the next, and you are practically and entirely driven out of the markets of the world. Do you suppose that the American wheat-grower in North Dakota, South Dakota, or Minnesota can raise wheat with the ryot of India, or the low class of men who raise wheat in South America or Russia? The ryot of India can be hired day in and day out for 5 cents a day. You can go to South American wheat countries where you can hire men for 30 cents a day. You can go to Russia and hire men for a mere fraction of half a dollar. The American wheat-grower, if he does the labor himself, thinks he must have more than a dollar a day; and he can not hire men unless he pays them practically that, when you count the board and the support he is compelled to give them.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Will it interfere with the Senator if I ask him a question?

Mr. TELLER. Nothing interferes with me on this subject.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I do not quite understand the Senator's logic, and perhaps it will enable me to understand it more correctly. I can not conceive of a condition in which there is a country with an open mint ready to take and bound to take all the supplies of silver that may be sent to it and coin it into money at the ratio of 15 to 1, and understand how there should be any surplus silver in the world. I can not understand for the life of me what difference it makes to the people of this country or to the people of England what may be the standard in India. I can not understand how it affects the London market for wheat, for cotton, for cattle, for corn, or for any product that we export to England because they have a gold standard while India has a silver standard.

Mr. TELLER. That is exactly the reason. If they had a gold standard in India, then it would have no effect. The Senator knows very well that up to 1873 not a bushel of wheat could ever come or had ever come from India. He knows very well that if silver to-day went to par not another bushel would come. If one country was not on a gold basis and the other on a silver basis the conditions I have detailed could not exist.

Mr. President, I did not intend to-day to touch the question of the price of wheat in India, but that seemed to arise incidentally, when I was mentioning the great fall of all products, and I have been tempted to dilate somewhat upon the condition of things that I should much rather have left to another time. I wish to leave that subject for the present at least. I think if the Senator from New Jersey will take the pains to carefully examine this question he can not doubt the conclusions at which I have arrived. They are the admitted conclusions of the financial papers of Great Britain, as I have before stated. They do not hesitate to say that the advent into Europe of India wheat is the result of the relation between silver and gold. Nobody disputes it in that country.

Now I come to one other question upon which I desire to spend a few moments, and I shall not continue my remarks at any length thereafter I think. We hear now everywhere the cry of "an honest dollar." That has been the shibboleth of our opponents—"an honest dollar"—and they assert that every man who is in favor of the free coinage of silver is dishonest; that he is in favor of a cheap dollar; that he is a repudiator of the public faith. What is the purpose, and what is the object of free coinage? It is to make the bullion out of the silver dollar worth just as much as the bullion in the silver dollar with the Government stamp. Can anybody tell me why 25.8 grains of gold, as at all time in this country, or at least since that amount was fixed, the bullion has been just as valuable as the coin?

It has been as valuable because you could put your bullion without expense into coin. Whenever you have established a mint and opened it, and said that all the silver in this country or any other can go to it, then the bullion outside of the mint is for all practical and currency purposes reduced to coin. That is what has kept up the price of gold when gold fell in Europe with the great output of Russian and Australian and the California mines. It was because the mint in this country and the mints of the world were opened and received all the gold that came and coined it that the price did not fall more than it did. Not an ounce of silver did we coin for many years. We coined the cheaper metal, which was gold, and we kept it from depreciating because we had an open mint. France coined more than $500,000,000 of gold within a few years for the express purpose of keeping it at par with silver. Yet in spite of all that silver went in the English markets to a premium of 2, 3, and in one instance 10 per cent above gold. What would have been the result if the mints had been closed against gold? It would not have been worth the coinage rate.

The purpose, then, of the free-silver people is to put silver bullion to par. But we are talked about as if we were in favor of taking 70 cents' worth of bullion and making it into a dollar. When we have opened our mints there will be no 70-cent bullion in this country; it will immediately take the price of the mint. Does anybody deny that?

Mr. HIGGINS. If the Senator will allow me, I will say that is just the great point of division.

Mr. TELLER. The great point of division! There can be no point of division on that. Suppose there are $100,000,000 of silver in this country to-day uncoined. You open your mint. What can you get for it? One hundred million silver dollars, legal-tender dollars, of just as much purchasing power as the dollar composed of gold. Is not that true to-day? The poor silver dollar that I have heard for fifteen years in this Chamber denominated a cheap dollar, a nasty dollar, a dishonest dollar, will buy as much, and what is infinitely of more importance to the American people, it will pay as much as a gold dollar. It requires as much labor, as many commodities, and as much sacrifice to obtain it as it does to obtain the gold dollar. Can the Senator from Delaware tell me why the present silver dollar is a dishonest dollar?

Mr. HIGGINS. I should like to answer the Senator's question by asking another, and that is whether in the Republic of Mexico, where they have free coinage, the Mexican dollar buys as much as a dollar in gold will buy?

Mr. TELLER. They have free coinage in Mexico, but Mexico does not have a legal-tender gold money. She is on a silver basis.

Mr. HIGGINS. Then, in further answer to the inquiry of the Senator as he put it to me, I would say that the question is whether we could retain the purchasing power of the silver dollar.

Mr. TELLER. I will address myself to that in a moment. I want to say that the silver dollar in Mexico has the same purchasing power exactly, except on account of the general fall in prices, that it ever had, and that has really given it a higher purchasing power. The next question the Senator asked is one I was about to address myself to. If we have free coinage can we maintain that relation between gold and silver which I declared to be indispensable to prosperity in this country? The Senator says that is the question. Why can we not do it? Does the Senator doubt that if we should put all the American product into coin we could maintain that relation? I think not. A limited amount we have maintained. I heard it said here by the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. Evarts], who is not now with us, that while he was not prepared to vote for free coinage, there could be no question about our ability to use all of the new silver that may be produced; that if we were not threatened with the coin silver of the world we would be safe to go to free coinage.

That brings me, then, to this question: Are we threatened with any inundation of silver from Europe, from China, from Asia, or from anywhere? It has been the stock in trade of the people who are opposed to free coinage to say in this Chamber, "You can not maintain the equilibrium between the two metals; you will be overthrown by the avalanche of silver that will come from abroad, and gradually your gold will go out and you will be left on a silver basis."

Mr. President, I should deplore very much to be on a silver basis, but I will repeat what I have said before, and what the great financial authority of France, Mr. Cernuchi, said in the convention of 1881: "If France must go to one metal or the other, France must go to silver." Then he went on to say why it was better for France to be on a silver basis than on a gold basis.

So I say, as much as I would lament the fact that we were on a single-standard basis, I infinitely prefer, in the interest of my country, that we should be on a silver basis. We should have more money. We should be able to trade with more people, with silver at par in those countries. We ought, on a silver basis, to take the entire Asiatic trade away from Great Britain. We ought, on a silver basis, to take the entire South American trade away from Great Britain.

It would not be an unmixed evil if we should come to a silver basis. I would deplore it, because I do not believe there is silver enough in the world to do business on with silver alone, because I think the two metals must be kept at parity, if possible, in the interest of commerce, and in the interest of trade, and in the interest of men.

Where is the silver coming from? Recently I took up a report of another body, and I saw in it that the free-silver people asked the United States to lift, unaided, $3,800,000,000 of European, Asiatic, South American silver to the dignity of money. Do not the Senators sitting around me know that that $3,800,000,000 is lifted now to the dignity of money? Do they not know that not a dollar of it could be coined in an American mint without a loss of 3 cents on its face, much of it 10? To lift the whole world's silver is the kind of argument we have been met with for years. Who is going to send it?

Mr. HIGGINS. Will the Senator yield to a question?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. HIGGINS. I am prompted to ask a question of the Senator because of the assurances that were held out to the Senate when the silver bill of 1890 was pending that if we should enact a law by which four and one-half million ounces of silver should be purchased per month it would take up what the distinguished Senator from Nevada [Mr. Jones], who sits on my left, called the slack, and practically bring silver to par.

Mr. TELLER. I do not care about being interrupted if the Senator wants to ask me something out of the order of my remarks. I am not making a prepared speech, but I am trying to make this speech in the direct order in which I think it ought to be made.

I will touch that question before I get through, and I hope satisfactorily to the Senator from Delaware. I am now touching upon the subject of the danger, which is the great bugbear, which is the black beast, that has been held up before us for fifteen years to frighten us from doing that which our judgment, I think, tells us we ought to do, that a great flood of silver money will come from abroad, and we shall be unable to retain our gold. Where will it come from? I shall not spend much time on this point. Will it come from England? She has $105,000,000 of subsidiary money doing duty up to $10 as a legal tender, and doing duty infinitely above that, doing as much money duty in Great Britain as her $350,000,000 of gold, which is all she has, although she claims to have $500,000,000. It is the money of everyday transactions in that country. It is the money that the man takes to the market; it is the money with which he pays his ordinary bills, with which he pays his servants. It is the money of the ordinary business of life. If it should come here it would come here at a loss of not less than 8 cents on a dollar, saying nothing of insurance, interest, and all the other items which must be included.

Mr. MORGAN. I should like to remind the Senator from Colorado that the largest piece of silver coinage of England is a shilling.

Mr. TELLER. I think the crown.

Mr. HIGGINS. A crown.

Mr. TELLER. A crown I believe is 120 cents. That is the largest, but their crown, which is worth 120 cents, contains very much less than our silver dollar. It will be admitted that we can not get silver from England. She could not spare it. Then let us go to France.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not think that there is any coinage of the crown in England now.

Mr. TELLER. It is in circulation.

Mr. MORGAN. I am talking about the coinage laws of Great Britain. The largest piece now coined is, I understand, a shilling.

Mr. TELLER. Now, let us go to France. France has $700,000,000 of money, according to the Treasury reports; $700,000,000 which belongs to France. She has $120,000,000 of silver belonging to other people. She has had the opportunity for five years to take gold for this $120,000,000 at the French ratio of 15 to 1, which she has declined, in the interest of commerce and trade and humanity, to take. She keeps it and circulates it as money. While it does not bear her imprint, yet she makes it good to the people, because she says you bring it to us and we will give you French money, gold or silver, as you wish, and she declines to exchange it for gold with the countries whose stamp it bears. Bimetallic France would no more discard her silver than we would discard voluntarily our gold. Bimetallic France has stood in the interest of trade and commerce as the equalizer of the two metals when there was likely to be a disparity because of the great output of gold. Then she sent her silver to India. She sent her dear money to India as to-day she is sending her dear gold to England to buy council bills, and thus she makes the dear money that she possesses bring her a greater amount of imports than she could with her cheaper money—cheaper only in Great Britain, not cheaper in France.

I saw in a paper a day or two since a statement that the silver of France did not circulate as money. There is more silver than gold in circulation in France. While the stock of gold is greater, silver is the money of the people of France. It is the money that the peasantry of France put away for a rainy day. It was silver that they brought out of its hiding when the Government of France asked for a loan and the French people put up seven dollars for one. France will not sell us her silver. Her history is a denial of that statement. Any man who will take the pains to study the question of French finance since the days of Napoleon will see that she is wedded to the bimetallic system as no other nation in the world has been. There are not more than half a dozen men of reputation in all France, men of any considerable character, who are in favor of the single gold standard.

Mr. STEWART. There are only $450,000,000 of silver outside of France in Europe.

Mr. TELLER. If France will not send us any silver who will? She could not send us very much without disturbing the business relations of the country. Austria has some silver, it is said. Austria for forty years has not been able to redeem her paper in either silver or gold, and while we have been debating the silver question in this country, Austria, on a paper basis, has been considering what kind of metallic basis she would have. When it looked favorable for silver in this country Austria inclined toward the bimetallic system.

When, on the contrary, it looked unfavorable she inclined towards the gold system, and there is every prospect to-day that she may go to a gold basis, driven to it by the irregular market of silver, owing to the discrimination in which we have joined the world against silver. But she could not send us more than fifty or sixty millions at most if she could send that much. What would that amount to if it came? The Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] says that there are only $450,000,000 of silver all told in Europe outside of France. The Senator has that too high, according to my figures, by at least one hundred million.

Mr. STEWART. I think it is too high; but that is the highest estimate put on the amount.

Mr. TELLER. They can not send us three hundred millions of silver, and we can consume that without difficulty. I know that Senators ask, can you do it? I heard some of the most illustrious members of this body on this subject fourteen years ago; I heard it from the Chairman of the Committee on Finance, I heard it from the present Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, then Secretary of the Treasury, that you can not maintain in this country more than fifty millions of silver on a par with gold. Nearly five hundred millions now are practically maintained at par—four hundred millions and more of silver dollars are maintained at par as good as gold.

The argument that you can not safely open your mints because you will be flooded with silver is an argument on a par with the one which I first mentioned, that you can not have an honest dollar unless you have put as much bullion in it as a gold dollar will now buy. I assert that no man here has ever on this floor been able to show with any degree of certainty, or even to a sufficient degree of certainty to alarm prudent men, that we could be overcome by an avalanche of silver.

Suppose the silver came here, what would become of it? It must be exchanged for our products. Oh, they say, it would be exchanged for gold. It would be if we wanted silver more than gold; and we would sell our gold whenever it was to our financial interest to sell it, as we sold to Europe in the month of May last $1,000,000 of gold every day, the holy Sabbath included. Seventy-two million dollars of gold in less than four months went to Europe from America, and every dollar of it, if the Treasury Department does not lie, went at a premium.

If the financial reports of the great money center of the world are not false, every dollar of it cost more in New York than it could be got for at the mint in the city of London. Bar gold has been quoted for a year past, I think without exception, at a higher rate than the mint value thereof in Great Britain. The only country that has gold at a premium (except in the sense that I shall, if I have time to speak of it, show that gold in this country may be said to be at a premium over products)—the only country that has gold at a premium over its mint value is Great Britain. This gold was absolutely essential to the peace of Great Britain and Europe. The financial condition was such that they had to have it and they sent for it and they got it, and they can command the gold of this country in spite of anything we can do.

Do Senators believe that we can hold gold when the great creditor nation that holds two thousand millions of our securities demands it? All she has to do is to put a premium on it, or, what is the same thing, say, "I will sell you these securities at a little below the market price," and then the gold goes. It will go, without a mint, without silver coinage. It will go, if on a gold basis, when they want it. We can not command it; we can not hold it. No debtor nation can command the market for gold. Yet we are asked to tie ourselves to the only metal that there is any danger we shall lose and we are told that that is in the interest of honest dollars and honest contracts!

Seventy-two million dollars of gold went out of this country, and the only people who were frightened in this country were the bankers and the brokers and the newspaper men of New York. They did their utmost to create a panic and a fright. They said the gold is going, the currency is to be contracted. The American farmer and the American merchant did not take fright. They knew that there were $400,000,000 of legal-tender money that Great Britain would not take and could not take under the present condition of affairs.

So I say, first, there is no danger of an influx of silver, and, secondly, that if Europe wants our gold she will get it in spite of us. If France and Italy and Germany should discard their silver money for gold they would get our gold whether our mints were open or whether they were closed—if not all, a great share of it.

Mr. President, I pass that point for the present. Now, I want to come down to a thing that touches me and touches my party. What is to be the relation of the Republican party to this question of currency as applied to silver? Heretofore we have contended that the silver question was nonpolitical, and we found ourselves in accord with our brethren on the other side of the Chamber holding different political views from us. We found no difficulty in acting with them upon this great economic question. To us it appeared to be above partisan feeling and above political influences, and we have acted with them now for many years with singular accord on this subject.

It is possible that we Republicans of the West have two reasons why we are in favor of silver as money. One is that we produce to-day nearly one-half of the silver of the world. We have been compelled by our relation to that industry to study the question of finance as touching silver. We may not be as capable as our Eastern brethren in handling financial questions, but we have been at least as industrious. It was a matter of interest to us. We have been helped and aided by the people living near us whose sympathies were naturally with us upon the currency question, not simply because we produce silver, but because they had suffered by the depreciation of all the products of human labor. We came here two years ago with high hopes and expectations. We had elected a Republican Administration upon a platform carefully and deliberately prepared, which declared that—

The Republican party is in favor of the use of both gold and silver as money, and condemns the policy of the Democratic Administration in its effort to demonetize silver.

Many of us were so confiding that we actually believed when that was put in our platform at Chicago that it meant what it said. We thought it meant that we were in favor of silver as money. Does any sane man say to me, you can use silver as money in the broad sense if you do not open to it your mints as you open your mints to gold? We thought the Republican party actually condemned the course of the late Democratic Administration in their efforts to repeal what we call the Bland act.

Mr. President, do you wonder that there were high hopes and high expectations, and that Colorado stood third in the list of Republican States for the present Executive? One very stump, in every camp we proclaimed that we were the party of silver. The Democratic party, in deference to its candidate and his known hostility to silver, did not dare to speak upon it. The only utterance that we could learn of was when a distinguished member of the committee on resolutions was accosted by a member from Colorado—I speak now of the Democratic convention—and he said, "What is the plank on silver?" and he replied, "Damn silver!" We believed that we had at last reached the point that the Republican party at least was in favor of financial relief to the people by the utilizing of the great output of silver on equal terms with gold.

I believe I state a fact when I say that every silver-producing camp in my State gave to the present Chief Executive a ma-majority. When we came here in December we were met with a proposition, if not an Administration proposition at least quasi so, for the purchase of bullion, for making the United States Treasury the conduit through which the silver could pass to India, and that was all there was of it. We were told by the friends of the Administration everywhere that if we did not accept that we would get nothing. We preferred to have nothing. We made the fight for free coinage here in this body, and we won. We lost in the other House, although I never have doubted, nor do I believe anybody else doubts, that there was a clean majority of that House in favor of free coinage, and they were restrained only from expressing their wishes by undue and improper Executive interference. We were told in the public press, and we were told otherwise, that a free-coinage bill would be vetoed by the present Executive.

Sir, you can imagine the disappointment of the representatives of Colorado. You can imagine something of the disappointment of the people of that State. We made a fight for the best thing we could get. We got but little in the way we wanted, and yet we got something that is better than nothing. We got that because the Executive knew and because the opponents of free coinage in this Chamber knew that if we did not get that we should present to the Executive a free-coinage bill which he would be either compelled to sign or to veto.

That brings me to another question which I have intended for some time to mention. My attention having been called to it recently again by some public utterances, I desire to make my statement here. There came from the House of Representatives during that Congress a bill that has been commonly dubbed the force bill. It was an election law. It went to a committee of which I am a member, as I was then. It had the attention of that committee for many days. The fifty-six sections, with which it came, were reduced, if I mistake not, to twenty-eight by that committee. I was a member of the majority of that committee. Without my vote that bill could not have got into the Senate unless at least the Senate had discharged the committee and ordered a report.

I consented that the bill might be reported to the Senate. Standing in my seat when it came here so reported, I reserved to myself the right to move any amendment to it, to propose any modification of it, and I declared that as it then stood it would not receive my vote. Two years nearly have elapsed. I have read that bill with care and attention more than twenty times; I have read it again in the light of calm consideration; and I repeat that if it was presented to me now with the question of my support or party dismissal I should not vote for the bill. A more infamous bill, in my judgment, never passed the threshold of the Senate. Avowedly in the interest of good government, it was instigated, in my judgment, by men whose interest was in preventing a free expression of the voters at the polls.

I have not time now to speak of that bill in detail. I was at that time laboring under a disability of voice that prevented me from speaking on it. I want to say here that my attitude on that bill had no relation, no connection directly, remotely, or otherwise with the question of silver. There is not a member who voted with me on the silver question and who voted with me on the election bill who will not bear me out when I say the statement that we contracted with members on the other side of the Chamber for their support for the free-coinage bill upon the ground that we would vote against the force bill is absolutely untrue, without the slightest foundation in fact.

If this story had not been repeated ad nauseam I would not add what I will add. What the late distinguished Senator from Kansas, Mr. Plumb, did say in the Senate I will only repeat, that the opponents of silver in this Chamber entered into a negotiation, some of them at least, with the other side of the Chamber, and proposed to them if they would side-track free coinage they would side-track the election bill; that bill which was said to be of more importance than all other bills. That proposition was declined by the free-silver men on the other side of the Chamber.

Another bill came here. It was a bill of vast importance and I think of great value to the country. It came in competition, as it were, with the election bill. The Senator from Massachusetts, who sits on my right and who was the chairman of the committee which reported that bill [Mr. HOAR], was anxious to take the election bill up and dispose of it before anything else, but he was in such a hopeless minority that he must have felt a good deal discouraged when he polled this side of the Chamber on that proposition. So the tariff bill came up and displaced the other bill, which ultimately came to an untimely end, greatly, I think, to the satisfaction of almost all, even my own side of the Chamber and the American public at large.

Mr. President, I have digressed in this way to show the method by which the silver men have been attacked. We are charged with betraying our party. We are charged with disregard of the high obligations that are upon us to preserve the elective franchise. I yield to no man in devotion to the purity of the ballot; I yield to no man in his desire that the public shall have the fullest expression of its will. I am so much in favor of that in the sense I now use it that I do not care to interfere with the expression of public will, even though it shall be against mine. I have confidence that the public will right itself on all questions if it gets wrong. I voted against the election bill practically, though not directly, because I believed it to be a bad bill, and not because the Senators on the other side of the Chamber had supported or intended to support free coinage or bimetalism in any shape that it might be presented.

Mr. President, I am brought to the very last thing that I care to speak of now, and I apologize to the Senate for the delay, for I assured the Senate when I rose to speak that I only intended to speak on one or two points, and I thought three-quarters of an hour would be ample. But I have been led into some digressions outside by reason of inquiries and interruptions. I now come to the last question: What is the attitude of the Republican party to be in regard to silver? Are we to be put at the next national convention upon a gold-standard platform, or are we to have another misleading plank in our platform that shall mean one thing on the stump and another thing in executive administration? We hear we are to be put on a gold-standard platform.

I was present at the birth of the Republican party; I participated in its first gathering; and I did not have the incentive that many of my associates sitting about me had to go into a new party, for I was not a member of a decaying party; I was a member of the dominant party, the party that in all probability would continue then to elect Presidents for a generation and to fill all the public offices everywhere. When the party with which I had been connected from my boyhood, and to which my father had belonged and been an honored member, forsook the great principles of democracy as I understood them, I found no difficulty in turning my back on that party and finding new political associates.

I do not anticipate turning my back on the Republican party, because I do not anticipate that the Republican party is to be the party of the gold standard; but if the signs of the times mean anything, if the efforts that are now being made to repeal the act of 1890 and leave us without any legislation touching silver mean anything at all, they mean that there is to be an effort made at the Minneapolis convention to put the Republican party in antagonism to silver.

I can not speak for the people of Colorado. They have honored me beyond my desert. They have sent me here by four different votes. I am here now by their consent and concurrence without much controversy, and while I know something of the people with whom I have lived for almost a generation, I do not pretend to speak for them. Many of them will be attached to the party to which they belong, and remain with it no doubt, whatever may be its attitude on the financial question, but if anything can be gathered by the present condition in Colorado it will be very unsafe for the Republican party to attempt to put us upon a gold platform at Minneapolis; it will be very unsafe for the Republican party, so far as that State at least is concerned, to attempt to go in any way against our utterances heretofore upon the silver question.

Fifteen years ago last fall I came into this body. I came in with the admission of Colorado, the Centennial State. We were the agency that gave to the Republican party the President that year. Without our vote the Democratic party would have had an unquestioned majority of the electoral college, and the controversy that arose, embittered somewhat and ugly, would have been avoided, but there would have been a Democratic House, and a Democratic Senate following it soon, and a Democratic President. Since I first came into this body there has been one Congress when the Senate was Democratic. There has been no Congress, as I recollect, that the votes of Nevada and Colorado were not needed on this floor to make this a Republican body.

I want to say now to the Senate, and I am saying it here that it may reach the American public, that it may reach the leaders of the Republican party—I do not say it in the excitement of the hour, I say it in the cool and calm deliberation of much thought, weighing well my words and the import of them and the criticism that they will bring me—if the Republican party stands for the gold standard, the four silver-producing States will not, in my judgment, hereafter be able to act in cooperation with the Eastern Republicans in this or any other body.

Why should we do so? We have local interests, we have general interests touching the currency question that we believe to be paramount to any other question. We supported the McKinley bill, not because we had a local interest; we supported it because we believed the general good of the country required a sacrifice on our part. Our local interests are against the bill. We are not the producers of manufactured goods. If they can be had cheaper it would appear to be better for us to buy them cheaper. We believed that the prosperity of the whole nation was bound up in the system of protection, and we have stood for it here and at home, and we intend to stand for it in the future. We make no threats. We are protectionists from principle, but we can not support and assist in the control of the Government by a party that is hostile to every local interest that we have and the general interest of the country as we understand that general interest.

I do not intend that anybody shall infer from the remarks I have made in my criticism of the Republican party, in my statement of the dangers which have threatened us, which now threaten us at Minneapolis, that I expect that the Democratic party will be any more liberal towards us as a party. It is true that we have had from that side of the Chamber many generous supporters. It is true that for the many years that we have been here endeavoring to secure a proper recognition for silver we have looked to men sitting on the other side of the Chamber with a certainty that they were our friends in this contest. But like our party, the Democratic party is in the toils of a power it dare not offend, and the danger is that these two great political parties in their anxiety to secure the State of New York, controlled as it is by a little circle in and about Manhattan Island, will neglect and repudiate the interest of the great masses of the country and act exactly alike on this silver question.

Mr. President, I beg the indulgence of the Senate for what may appear to some to be matters that ought not to be brought here, and I want to assure my associates on this side of the Chamber that I do not come here and make these statements without great regret. No man who is a man criticises those with whom he is associated politically or in any other way except that it be as a matter of duty. I have felt compelled and impelled to say what I have said because of my belief that the question of silver money, the use of the two metals, is the great question now presented for the solution of mankind.

I stated in the beginning that it was a question touching every man. It is a great economic question. It touches not the material interests alone; it touches the intellectual and the moral condition of all men. Can we destroy one-half of the money of the world—that is what it actually means on our part—can we destroy one-half of the money of the world and not create distress. Can we do the business of the world and continue the progress and the development that have been going on since 1845, not only here, but all over the world, on the least amount of money metal, gold?

I do not believe it. I believe the adoption of the gold standard in this country means the adoption of the gold standard throughout the world.

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] put a question to me which evidently refers to the efforts being made for an international conference. I introduced in July, 1890, a resolution for an international conference. I have stated once on the floor of the Senate that it came to naught. I state now that it came to naught through the influence of the executive department of the Government. I introduced another resolution for an international conference early in this session. It has come to naught so far. In my judgment it will come to nothing. And yet we are told that this is the only way to rehabilitate silver, that it is the only way to secure bimetalism.

I have ever been in favor of an international conference that should open all the mints of the world if possible, and if not, as many as could be opened. What has been done by the opponents of silver? Has any gold man ever suggested, except when he wanted to defeat free coinage, an international conference? Has the Executive taken any steps? Is he taking any now? Is not the power with him? We shall have an international conference when we have elected an Executive who is in favor of it. We shall have open mints all over the world when we have an Executive and a Legislature back of him in favor of doing that. We shall make ourselves felt in European politics and European finance when we try, but we have not tried and we can not try until we have all the departments of the Government in accord on this subject.

Let us meet this question fairly. Are we to go to a gold basis absolutely, or are we to use the two metals on equal terms? The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], who presided over the Treasury Department, told us that the Bland act would bring us to a silver basis. Every Executive we have ever had since has told us the same thing. Every Secretary of the Treasury, unless it be the present one, told us the same thing. Are we in a better condition with the act of 1890? If the Bland act was dangerous, is not the act of 1890? The act of 1878 elevated all the silver purchased to the dignity of money. The act of 1890 leaves it as a commodity, not by the law but by the practice of the executive department. If we were in danger of a silver basis under the act of 1878, are we not equally in danger under the act of 1890?

We are not going to a silver basis. We are either going to have bimetalism in this country or we shall go to a gold basis, and with it will come the depreciation and the destruction of property, as it came to Great Britain when she changed her system from silver to a gold standard. By the act of 1815, put in force in 1821, she brought dire disaster upon all the industries of that country. That act changed the entire land system of Great Britain. The independent farmer of Great Britain disappeared under that act and its operations. When you have adopted the gold standard in this country the independent farmer will disappear, as he disappeared in Great Britain.

When you have given to the dollar a purchasing power, as you have now, 30 per cent more than normal, when you have added to it by the entire destruction of the silver of the world as you propose, so that a dollar will buy what it took two dollars to buy when bimetalism existed, you have doubled the debt; you have put upon the struggling debtor a burden that he can not stand under. He can scarcely now stand erect in manhood under the great accumulation of debt. This is the great debtor period of the world. The debts are a hundredfold more than they were three hundred years ago, and you are by a depreciation of all products, by means of the gold standard, practically to double this great indebtedness, not only here but all over the world. Can you view the prospect with equanimity? We can not look at it with satisfaction, nor can we look at it with composure.

Mr. President, it will not do to say that you can not destroy this civilization. It will not do to say that the splendid achievements, intellectually and morally and commercially, of the last fifty years can not be destroyed by bad finance. Rome and Greece in their glory might have said the same thing. In many things their civilization was greater and higher than ours. In many things they were our superiors. Gradually, for the lack of money, the civilization of Rome went out, and we had the long dreary wilderness through which the race marched from the days of the decay of Rome to the discovery of America. When the great treasury chambers of the world were opened, when Europe felt the reviving influences of the millions of gold and silver from South America, then the shackles were lifted from all the industries of the world. Nay more, and what is more important, they were lifted from the mind and the morals of men. The human race moved upward in its plane. Great and good as was the commercial growth and development, it was nothing compared with the mental and moral growth of the people of the world for three hundred years.

The history of the world may repeat itself. Make use of the money we have, and we are the strongest people in the world. Cast it aside, and there will be distress and disaster and gradual decay. From 1809 to 1846 there was a fair prospect that the world was returning to the conditions before the discovery of America. The output of silver and gold had ceased. Business fell off, all products were low, and general distress prevailed, and until the great output of gold in Russia, there was a condition that in a degree remarkably resembled the condition of the world at the time of the discovery of America. When the gold poured in from Russia, from Australia, and California, every industry revived, commerce increased, and I make no idle statement when I say that from 1846 to 1892, in splendor of achievement, in splendor of progress, in splendor of development of all that goes to make life worth living, we have exceeded that of any two hundred years in the history of the world.

It is to be attributed to the use of metallic money, with the full privilege of using all that was produced. With such object lessons before us, can we deliberately pursue a course that shall destroy one-half the money in existence and leave the world without a sufficiency of currency, not enough even to keep the metallic stock in existence as it now exists?

I may be a fanatic, I may be an enthusiast. Every word I have uttered upon this subject lies close to my heart. I believe it, and I want to repeat, I warn my party, great as it has been in achievements, great as it has been in its history, much as its members are attached to it, it can not afford to put itself on the side of a contraction to the extent of one-half of the volume of the money of the world, either by deliberate action in that direction or by a refusal to affirmatively act in opposition to that attempt.

Mr. SANDERS. Mr. President, I do not desire to submit to the Senate at the present time any observations upon the question of the free coinage of silver. The State of Montana, next to the State of Colorado, is the largest producer of that metal. But the Senator from Colorado has been pleased to speak of the political affiliations of the four silver-producing States, and to prophesy something of their future political identification. That the people of those States are deeply interested in this question can not be denied; but speaking for the State of Montana, I am certain that she will not change her political identification in any spirit of petulance or for any purposes of revenge.

Indeed, looking at this question as presented by the Senator from Colorado, I am reminded of a young friend of mine who on the evening of the election a year ago last fall as he watched the count of the returns of the town in which I reside and listened to the telegraphic reports from surrounding villages and cities became discouraged, and when he found his political party overwhelmed declared that he would leave the State. He went home and packed up his library. The next morning he came down and bought a morning paper which contained telegraphic reports of the results of the election from Maine to Texas and from Florida to Oregon. Being interrogated as to his purpose to leave the State he said he had changed his mind, for he did not know where to go. [Laughter.]

Whenever the time shall arrive when the people of the silver-producing States, dissatisfied with existing conditions, shall proceed to inquire how they can best subserve their public interests by political action, they will determine their identity and identification soberly and with the modesty of tearful duty.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. FITHIAN, for one week, from Friday, April 22, on account of important business.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. O'FERRALL. Mr. Speaker, I call up for consideration the contested-election case of Noyes vs. Rockwell.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment, to ask unanimous consent for the consideration of a bill.

Mr. O'FERRALL. I will yield for that purpose, if it does not provoke any discussion.

BRANCH NATIONAL BANK AT THE WORLD'S FAIR.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8001) to authorize a national bank at Chicago, Ill., to establish a branch office upon the grounds of the World's Columbian Exposition.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc. That any national bank located in the city of Chicago and State of Illinois which may be designated by the World's Columbian Exposition to conduct a banking office upon the Exposition grounds is hereby authorized to open and conduct such office as a branch of the bank, subject to the same restrictions and having the same rights as the bank to which it belongs: Provided, That the branch office authorized hereby shall not be operated for a longer period than two years, beginning not earlier than July 1, 1892, and closing not later than July 1, 1894.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. GOODNIGHT. I do not know that I understand what the purpose of that bill is.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. It is to permit the establishment of a branch office of a national bank on the grounds of the Exposition at Chicago. The grounds of the Exposition are 7 miles from any bank, and this is to enable persons interested to do certain banking business necessary. The Comptroller of the Currency recommends that it be done, and to authorize a Chicago national bank to establish a branch there, so that parties at the Exposition may be able to do their banking business.

Mr. GOODNIGHT. A local bank?

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. No, a national bank.

Mr. GOODNIGHT. Can not that accommodation be furnished through a private bank?

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. No, it could not.

Mr. GOODNIGHT. Why not? They are doing business all over the country.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. It would not have the confidence that one of these national banks would. This is a unanimous report from the committee.

Mr. GOODNIGHT. I do not see any demand for it; but if the gentleman wants it, and it is needed for the World's Fair, I shall not object.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. It was asked for by the board of officers of the Exposition.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The amendments of the committee will be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 4, after the word "Illinois," strike out the word "which."
In line 6, after the word "grounds," insert "and upon such designation being approved by the Comptroller of the Currency, said bank."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HOPKINS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. O'FERRALL. I ask unanimous consent that any gentleman who may have reports from committees may be permitted to hand them to the Clerk.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

REMARKS OF MR. WALKER OF MASSACHUSETTS.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, some days ago an order of the House was adopted relative to some remarks made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER].

Mr. O'FERRALL. I can not hear the gentleman.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I say a few days ago some remarks made by the gentleman from Massachusetts were referred to the Committee on Printing. A report was made recommending that a portion of his remarks be excluded from the RECORD. There was no objection to the bulk of his remarks, and their publication in the RECORD has been suspended.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent, and I hope there will be no objection, that so much of the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts as have not been objected to, and not included in the report of the Committee on Printing, be printed in the permanent RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

NOYES VS. ROCKWELL.

Mr. O'FERRALL. Mr. Speaker, I now call up for consideration the contested-election case of Noyes against Rockwell.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Hosea H. Rockwell was not elected a Representative to the Fifty-second Congress from the Twenty-eighth Congressional district of New York and is not entitled to the seat.

Resolved, That Henry T. Noyes was elected a Representative to the Fifty-second Congress from the Twenty-eighth Congressional district of New York and is entitled to the seat.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama is entitled to the time yielded him by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BAON].

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I have great respect for the chairman of the Committee on Elections, who made this report in favor of unseating Mr. Rockwell; and also for the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LAWSON], but I am convinced from an examination of the record, which I made with great care, that they have committed a very great error in both the law and the facts of this case. The report, in the very beginning, contains a very flagrant error. They state that the burden of proof rests upon Mr. Rockwell, who has the certificate—who has the judgment of the election officers and the board of canvassers in his favor, because they say they find evidence that causes them to think that Mr. Noyes had a majority of the votes, and therefore they say that the burden of proof is upon Mr. Rockwell.

There can not be a more erroneous principle of law laid down than that. We all know that where a chancellor decides a case upon a question of evidence, and the case is appealed, the burden rests upon the appellant to show that the chancellor was wrong. Now, suppose for the purpose of illustration that a chancery case was pending between Mr. Rockwell and Mr. Noyes, and that the chancellor should decide the case in favor of Mr. Rockwell, what would we think of an appellate court which should render an opinion based upon so erroneous a principle? What would we think of an appellate court which would state in their opinion reversing the case, "We decide the case against Mr. Rockwell, and in order to make our decision possible, we also decide that the burden rests upon Mr. Rockwell to show that the chancellor was right in rendering an opinion in his favor?" And this is practically the position taken by the majority report of the Committee on Elections.

The law says the burden of proof should be upon Noyes, and it remains there and can not be removed. It is necessary for the committee to take the position which they have taken in order to bring in this report.

I think they have committed another grave error. On the very last day that evidence could be taken in rebuttal Mr. Noyes took evidence in chief, evidence which it was impossible for Mr. Rockwell to refute.

The committee should not have regarded that testimony at all; they should have suppressed it; but they throw it into this House as one of the strongest grounds for unseating Mr. Rockwell. There could hardly be a greater error than that, and it seems to me that these errors inflict a great wrong upon a Democrat by a Democratic House of Representatives. [Laughter.] Then, in order to sustain their report, they have incorporated a newspaper report of a decision by Judge Barnard, which they ought not to have done, because a newspaper report of a decision published, I believe, in a Republican paper, ought not to be made the basis for unseating a member of this body; but it gives me great pleasure to inform the House that the principle laid down in this decision upon which they rely, and must rely to win their case, has within the last ten days been disapproved by the court of appeals of New York. The more I have studied the evidence the more I become convinced that there is no ground for the report of the committee in the case before us.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is but one thing for this House to consider, and that must be determined by the pleadings and evidence in the record. The question is which candidate had the greatest number of legal ballots in the boxes cast by legal voters when the polls closed at 5 o'clock November 4, 1890.

The officers of election certified that Mr. Rockwell received 12,440 votes, and Mr. Noyes 12,351, giving Mr. Rockwell 89 votes more than Mr. Noyes.

The majority of the Committee on Elections give Mr. Noyes 12,404 votes, and they give Mr. Rockwell 12,398, thus giving Mr. Noyes a majority of 6 votes.

The evidence in the case is reduced to a very narrow point. We will first consider the question of the changes made by the Committee on Elections in the returns from six election precincts in the city of Elmira. These were the only election precincts or districts where there was any contest as to the number of votes cast for the candidates.

The majority of the Committee on Elections, I think with great impropriety, on page 6 of their report, state the votes at these six election districts, as I will read:

That the House may have all the facts we give here a table of the result of the two counts as claimed by the attorney for Rockwell in his brief:

	Official.		Unofficial.
	Noyes.	Rockwell.	Noyes.	Rockwell.
First district, First ward	82	103	81	104
Second district, First ward	119	62	115	66
Second district, Third ward	34	25	34	28
Fifth district, Third ward	125	110	123	111
Third district, Fifth ward*	73	87	66	94
Fourth district, Sixth ward	55	71	47	79
	1488	458	466	481

* There was not a recount in this district. (See Record, 146, 148.)

† Majority for Noyes, 30.

‡ Majority for Rockwell, 15.

I want to have the majority of the Election Committee explain by what right they put the word "official" over the table which foots up so as to give Mr. Noyes a majority of 30 in these six election districts, and I also ask them by what authority they place the word "unofficial" which foots up so as to give Mr. Rockwell 15 majority. There is nothing in Mr. Rockwell's brief to authorize or justify it, although the report heads the table with these words:

We give here a table of the result of the two counts as claimed by the attorney for Rockwell in his brief.

There was certainly nothing in Mr. Rockwell's attorney's brief to justify it, and in truth and in fact the figures which gave Mr. Rockwell 15 majority were the official figures acted upon by the county officials and the board of canvassers and certified to Congress by the State board of canvassers. These are the returns which the members of the committee seeking to unseat Mr. Rockwell assert are unofficial, and the same gentlemen assert that the counts or returns which give Noyes 30 majority are official, in the face of the fact that they were discarded by the county election officials and State board of canvassers, and in face of the further fact that these counts or returns were never certified to Congress.

I insist, Mr. Speaker, that the committee ought to reverse their captions, because according to the evidence the counts which give Rockwell 15 majority are "official," and the counts which give Noyes 30 majority are not "official."

Mr. Rockwell's attorney in his brief, page 7, recites the votes in these districts, as follows:

	Noyes.		Rockwell.
	First count.	Second count.	First.	Second.
First district, First ward	82	81	103	104
Second district, Third ward	34	34	25	26
Fifth district, Third ward	125	123	110	112
Third district, Fifth ward	73	66	87	94
Fourth district, Sixth ward	55	47	71	79
Second district, First ward	119	115	62	69

The whole question so far as these boxes affects the case is, which count is correct, the one called the first count, or the second count. The question is which count truthfully states the number of ballots in these six boxes for the two candidates when the polls closed November 4, 1890. There is but one way to determine this, and that is by the evidence from the record. Now, as the committee only claim 6 majority for Noyes, if the committee should decide everything in this case for Noyes, except the count in the third district, Fifth ward of Elmira, that Mr. Rockwell would be elected.

In other words, Mr. Rockwell only needs 7 of the 45 votes which the evidence shows he was entitled to and which the majority of the Committee of Elections take from him and give Noyes.

These 45 votes were counted for Mr. Rockwell by the inspectors of election, by the county officials, and by the State board of canvassers, and Congress has no right to take them from Mr. Rockwell; but even if Congress should do so we are compelled to deduct the illegal 16 Doyle ballots from Noyes, and that would elect Mr. Rockwell, even though we concede everything else to Mr. Noyes.

Before we proceed with the evidence I will refer to a decision of the appellate court of New York, which seems to have misled the committee.

It is true that the Supreme Court of New York has rendered a decision which simply refers to what the canvassers ought to have done under the law, and in that decision they say that the canvassers ought to have reported the first imperfect returns and acted upon them, instead of the later and accurate returns. They say further, that in deciding the question before them, they seem to wish it to be fully understood that they do not decide this contest, and the court does pretend to decide it. The decision does not go further than to lay down a rule for the guidance of inspectors in the elections which are to take place hereafter. The court says this contest must be decided by another tribunal, namely, the House of Representatives.

Now, what are we to base our decision upon? There is but one question for us to decide. Let me repeat we are to take the evidence in this cause and learn from it how many legal votes Mr. Rockwell had in those six precincts when the polls closed at 5 o'clock on the 4th day of November and how many Mr. Noyes had. That is all we have to do. It makes no difference about the returns. We are to cut right short at 5 o'clock on the 4th of November and determine from the evidence what was the condition then.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. How are you going to ascertain that?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I am glad my friend has asked that question. We are to ascertain it by the evidence, as we do in every other election case that is brought before this body, and the evidence is overwhelming and uncontradicted that at that time, 5 o'clock on the 4th of November, 1890, Mr. Rockwell had a number of votes which elected him by nearly one hundred majority.

That was the first election ever held under the new law. It required six times as many officers as had been usually employed in the elections in New York, and therefore most of them were quite inexperienced. The evidence is that these inexperienced men—I have the evidence here page by page—the evidence is that they counted these votes hurriedly and counted them illegally, and did it by simply pouring out the ballots on a table, dividing them out into several piles, and counted them out as you would count silver dollars. They divided what they called the "straight" Democratic tickets and the "straight" Republican tickets and put them down as so many for Rockwell and so many for Noyes.

Then they found a number of "split" tickets, and those "split" tickets they proceeded to count and to give Rockwell credit for the tickets with Republican headings that had his name on them, and to give Noyes credit for the tickets with Democratic headings that had his name on them. But, this being Rockwell's home, there were a great many tickets voted by his personal Republican friends which had the name of Noyes pasted over with the name of "Rockwell," and in the returns which the officers made by the first count they committed the error of not giving Mr. Rockwell credit for all the ballots of this character to which he was entitled.

We insist that what was called the first count was illegally, hurriedly, and improperly conducted, and as a consequence many errors were committed.

To illustrate: In the fourth district of the Sixth ward the counting was done illegally. In what was called the first count only four persons participated. Two of them were not inspectors; they were radical Republicans and unqualified partisans. They were intruders and were not sworn. The ballots were dumped on a box upon the table and the two inspectors and the two intruders each counted a handful of ballots, and the proof shows that these unsworn Republican intruders counted but 71 votes for Rockwell, when in fact he received 79, and that they counted 55 for Noyes, when in fact he received but 47.

The majority of the Committee on Elections insist on upholding this illegal and erroneous count in order to sustain them in turning Mr. Rockwell out of his seat in this body.

There is abundant evidence in the record to show the hurried and improper manner by which this first count was conducted. Mr. Charles B. Davis, page 147, testifies:

Q. Was this count of the first night made hurriedly?

A. Why, yes; it was a long day—from 7 or 8 o'clock. We were all in a hurry to get away. I know I was, and we made it hurriedly.

Q. How was the count made on election night as to being done hurriedly or otherwise?

A. I think we hurried through pretty fast.

Mr. Stapleton, the Republican inspector, testifies on this subject, as follows:

Q. To be correct, there was no special or undue haste in that proceeding, was there?

A. Oh, there was considerable hustle, of course, as there always is on election night.

Q. Simply they were busy about it?

A. Yes; they were busy trying to get through; worked fast.

Q. Trying to get through as rapidly as they could?

A. Yes, sir.

Again, on page 145, I read from the evidence:

Q. Was this count which was made the first night hastily made?

A. I should think it was.

Q. All in a hurry to get away?

A. Yes, sir; naturally so.

The evidence of all the witnesses shows that the first counting of the votes upon which the returns were made was done illegally, besides being hurriedly done and that it was inaccurate. I give below the evidence of James R. Colburn, editor, who was inspector in the Second district, First ward. He testifies that as soon as the polls were closed the ballots were counted, as I will read, page 119:

Q. Will you state how the votes were counted?

A. Well—

Q. That is, first state what was done with the ballot box?

A. The ballot box was unlocked by myself, I believe, and the contents poured out on the table, and they were divided into six or seven or eight piles. I couldn't remember just exactly which.

Q. Just state what persons actually participated in the counting.

A. Well, there was myself, Mr. George, Mr. Park, Mr. Loring, Mr. Chrisler, Mr. Miller, and Mr. Wells; I think that was all.

Q. You first counted the entire number of ballots and compared it with the poll list?

A. Yes, sir; well, the ballots were divided into—each one took a separate pile: I think Mr. George divided the piles.

Q. Did you find that the whole number of ballots corresponded with the poll list?

A. I think so, to the best of my recollection.

Q. Then each person took a number of ballots and opened them?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And put them in piles?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Were the straight tickets counted by themselves?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And the splits themselves?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Who acted as tally clerk?

A. Mr. Miller; he acted as tally clerk, and had a pile of tickets also.

Q. Now, when each person had completed his count, did he call off verbally to the tally clerk?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. As to the straight tickets you simply called off so many straight tickets?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And as to the splits did you call off the name?

A. The straight tickets were called off, then laid aside.

Q. In the splits did you call off the name of each person, how many votes he had?

A. I presume so.

Q. What is your recollection?

A. That is my best recollection.

Q. Did any one present verify the count of another person?

A. No, sir.

Q. So the only method was by each person calling off to the tally clerk and his taking it down?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. That constituted the basis of the count?

A. Yes, sir.

The above is a substantial description of the method of counting adopted by the inspectors in each of the six districts in question. In every one the inspectors poured the ballots out of the box on the table and divided them up in several piles, and some inspector would count one or more piles, first, as they state, counting the straight tickets and then counting the split tickets.

Anyone at all familiar with the conduct of elections will admit that such a method of counting ballots would most probably involve errors, and particularly would this be the case when the work was done hurriedly.

It appears from the evidence that Elmira was the home of Mr. Rockwell, and that many Republicans, from personal reasons, voted for him by substituting the name of Mr. Rockwell for that of Mr. Noyes on the Republican ballots.

These were called split tickets, and it is natural that officials in a hurried count, conducted as this counting was done—that the officials in counting the straight Republican tickets would in some instances fail to observe that Mr. Rockwell's name had been pasted over that of Mr. Noyes.

It was in this way that in Mr. Rockwell's home he failed on the first count to get credit for all the split ballots which were cast for him. It will be seen that four causes combined to give Mr. Rockwell less votes than were cast for him:

1. Inexperienced election officials.
2. Hurried action of the inspectors in estimating the votes.
3. Illegal method of counting the votes.
4. The number of split tickets cast at the boxes located at the home of Mr. Rockwell.

Now, the statute of New York (paragraph 42) provides that the inspectors shall paste upon the returns one specimen of every kind of ballot voted, and shall write, partly on the ballot and partly on the return, the number of ballots of that kind that have been voted. They did that in one instance only, and did it on but one of three returns. On account of the failure of the election officers to comply with that part of the law, it being the first time it was required by the law of New York, the returns were sent back, and the officials then proceeded to examine the ballots and paste them on the returns and write upon them the number of ballots of each kind, as the law required them to do.

But to be fully understood I will read the exact words of the law:

Section 42 of the code of New York, under which this litigation arose, is as follows:

The canvass shall be completed by ascertaining how many ballots of the same kind, corresponding in respect to the names of the persons thereon and the offices for which they are designated, have been received; and the result being found the inspector shall securely attach to a statement of such canvass, one ballot of each kind found to have been given for the officers to be chosen at such election, any or either of them, except those given for electors of President or Vice-President; and they shall state in words at full length, immediately opposite such ballot and written partly on the ballot and partly on the paper to which it shall be attached, the whole number of all the ballots that were received which correspond with the one so attached, so that one of each kind of the ballots received at such election, for the officers then to be chosen, shall be attached to such paper, with a statement of such canvass. (Sec. 42.)

In complying with this law the evidence is emphatic that the inspectors or managers of the election acted with deliberation and care and they testify that the returns written upon the ballots which were pasted upon the returns show a correct result.

If the evidence of these witnesses, including both Republicans and Democrats is correct, then Mr. Rockwell is unquestionably elected, and as this evidence is not impeached or in any way contradicted Congress is bound to accept it as the truth.

William Carpenter was an inspector for the first district, First ward.

He testifies, page 109:

Q. How was this second count made as to being made carefully?

A. Well, I didn't—I think they counted it carefully; they counted it over about a dozen times, to try to straighten the back of the returns, you know.

Q. And how long did you remain together?

A. I don't know; we must have worked there until pretty near midnight, I guess.

Q. Well, sir; from the part that you took in that count and the work that was done there, what do you say as to that second count being correct?

A. Why, of course, as near as I know, I should think it was.

Q. That is your best judgment from the work that you did there and the efforts that you made to get at it?

A. Yes, sir.

The uncontradicted proof is, that in making the second count, when they pasted a ballot of each kind on the back of the returns, the inspectors found in the first and hurried count they had by accident counted one "split" vote for Noyes which further inspection showed belonged to Rockwell.

Henry Loring was an inspector for the second district, first ward.

He testifies, page 115:

Q. Did you satisfy yourself that the second set of returns correctly represented the vote before you signed it?

A. Yes, sir; I assisted in the count.

Q. Why was it that new returns were made instead of altering the old returns?

A. I don't remember why that was; I think the clerk instructed the board to get new returns and fill them out.

Q. Was there anything said on the subject of the number of erasures that would be made upon the face of the old returns, if you attempted to alter them?

A. I don't remember that.

The uncontradicted evidence shows that when the inspectors pasted the ballots on the outside of the returns from this precinct or district, they found that they committed an error in the first count by counting four "split" ballots for Noyes that should have been counted for Rockwell.

James R. Colburn, another inspector, second district, First ward, testifies on this subject, as follows, page 121:

Q. Then you made out a new set of returns?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And did you assist in pasting on the sample ballots?

A. I don't remember whether I assisted in pasting them on or whether Mr. Wells and Mr. Andrews did that; I think they did that and I wrote "so many ballots of this kind."

A. Yes, sir; and Andrews were both Republicans?

A. Yes, sir. I may have pasted some on; I don't remember positively.

Q. And you wrote on the back of the ballot, partly on the ballot and partly on the paper, the number of ballots of each kind?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And did you correctly write the number as the count showed?

A. Yes, sir; I wrote them on one and Mr. Andrews wrote on the other.

Q. You wrote on one set of returns and he on the other set of returns?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. There were three sets made?

A. I think I probably wrote on two; I don't think Mr. Wells did; I don't remember.

Q. Then these returns were signed by the inspectors?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. From the part that you took in that count are you able to say that that count was a correct count of the ballots?

A. Yes, sir.

John T. Lennox was inspector in the second district, Third ward. His testimony regarding the second count, when they complied with the law and pasted the ballots on the returns, is as follows, page 127:

Q. Who produced the envelope of ballots?

A. Mr. Moss.

Q. Was it opened in your presence?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was it in the same condition when produced there that it was the night before?

A. I should say it was, to the best of my knowledge.

Q. Bore no evidence of having been opened?

A. No, sir.

Q. Then what did you do by way of getting your sample ballots?

A. Well, we went at it the same as we did to count them the night before.

Q. Did you divide them up into piles?

A. Yes; we went through them, he and I.

Q. And assorted out the different kinds?

A. Yes, sir; straight Republicans, straight Democratic, the same as we had the night before.

Q. And did you ascertain by count the number of each kind of ballot?

A. I think we did.

Q. And were one of each kind of ballot pasted upon one of the returns?

A. It was, yes, sir.

Q. Who did the writing on the back as to the number of that kind of ballot?

A. Mr. Moss.

Q. And having done that did you complete the other two returns?

A. We did.

Q. Where there was only one of one kind of ballot that had been cast and you required three of that kind, how did you get the other two?

A. Manufactured them.

Q. Out of the straight ballots?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. About how long were you engaged in that work?

A. I should think about two hours; or about that.

Q. Did you do it carefully?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did both you and Mr. Moss assist in putting the ballots into piles and counting them?

A. We were the only ones that did it.

Q. You two did the work together?

A. Yes, sir.

The witness testifies that what was called the second count was done carefully, occupying about two hours.

John P. Harrington, an inspector in the fifth district, Third ward, testifies as follows, p. 131:

Q. Did you meet with the board on the following night?

A. I did.

Q. Where?

A. In the booth.

Q. Who were present?

A. There was Mr. Wise and Lobdell, George L. Dale, George Dale, and myself.

Q. Any of the United States supervisors there?

A. Mr. Duhi.

Q. What was done then?

A. Why, we opened the box to get out the ballots to attach to the returns.

Q. Who unlocked the box, as you remember?

A. I don't remember whether Mr. Wise unlocked it or I did.

Q. Then did you select your sample ballots?

A. We started in to, yes, sir.

Q. Were they—each kind of a ballot put in a pile by itself?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And did you find out how many ballots of each kind of ballots there were?

A. Well, when we left the night before the ballots were done up or supposed to be done up separate and wrapped up, and when we picked up the Republican straight tickets and took off the first two that we came to to attach to the returns one of those tickets was a split Republican ticket with Rockwell's name in it.

Q. That was in a pile of straight Republican tickets?

A. Yes; in a pile of straight Republican tickets.

Q. Well, in order to make this count and get your sample ballots and the number of each kind of samples you had to count all the tickets there were, didn't you, over again?

A. I don't know as we counted all the tickets over again.

Q. How was it possible to find how many ballots there were of each kind if you didn't count each kind?

A. Well, when we found that error there we went through the straights and found there was two tickets in the straights that didn't belong there, that should be with the splits.

Q. Now, Mr. Harrington, you ascertained there in that count how many straights there were, didn't you?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And how many of each kind of splits there was?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. To do that you had to count each kind, didn't you?

A. We did; yes, sir.

Q. In order to write on the back of them, so many of this kind of ticket cast?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. So you did count every ballot that was in the box over again; isn't that true?

A. I don't remember whether we counted all the splits over again or not; they were done up in separate bundles and indorsed; wrapped up with rubbers around them.

Q. Do you mean that each kind of split —?

A. No, the split tickets were all rolled up together; the split tickets—we had to assort them.

Q. You had to assort them and find out how many there were of each kind?

A. Yes, sir; to make copies.

Q. And in what were supposed to be straight Republican tickets you found two tickets in favor of Mr. Rockwell?

A. Yes, sir.

Here we have positive evidence that in the first count two tickets were counted for Noyes which belonged to Rockwell.

Mr. Harrington proceeds in his evidence as follows, page 132:

Q. Did you find any other errors?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. On other offices?

A. On judge of the court of appeals; they returned only 2 votes to me on the night before, and in looking them over we found 3 ballots had been cast for Francis Gerow instead of 1; and also for Isaac Andrews.

Q. How many did the face of the returns show that Isaac Andrews had received?

A. Thirteen, I believe.

Q. And by the ballots themselves?

A. He had 14.

Q. On the face of the returns, how many had Mr. Noyes received?

A. On the face, 125.

Q. And by the tickets themselves, how many had he?

A. One hundred and twenty-three.

Q. And on the face of the returns, how many did it show Mr. Rockwell had received?

A. One hundred and ten.

Q. And by the tickets themselves?

A. One hundred and twelve.

Q. Were there any Republican statesmen who were present while you were making this recount?

A. There were several.

Q. Who were they?

A. Senator Fassett, Mr. Wright, Rook Stowell—oh, I don't know; I couldn't name them; the booth was crowded.

Q. Did they claim they had no right to alter the face of the returns?

A. They did; Senator Fassett didn't know much about it either way.

Q. So you decided not to alter the face of the returns?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And didn't alter them?

A. Did not.

Q. But you did paste upon the returns a sample of each ticket cast and write upon the back the number of that ticket that were cast?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And left it for the board of supervisors to determine the question?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Now, from the count that you made there that night, did you satisfy yourself that this second count was correct?

A. I satisfied myself that the ballots were correct that were attached to the returns.

Q. And did you satisfy yourself that that correctly showed the number of votes that had been cast for Representative in Congress?

A. Yes, sir; I did.

It will be seen here that the witness reiterates that the second count was correct, and that Mr. Rockwell should have 112 votes at the box instead of 110 as at first reported. All this evidence is corroborated by Mr. Fred. H. Wise, another inspector of the fifth district, Third ward, who testifies that the election was held and the ballots counted in an illegal way. He testifies that the ballots and returns were locked up and sealed. He then testifies, page 137:

Q. On the following day you were notified the county clerk refused to file the returns?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you understand that he required that sample ballots should be annexed to them?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. When you learned that what did you do?

A. Why, we had to go down to the booth and open up the box and take out the ballots.

Q. You did go down to the booth and reconvene?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you see the ballot box unlocked?

A. I did; yes, sir.

Q. Who unlocked it?

A. I unlocked it myself.

Q. You unlocked it yourself?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Of whom did you get the key?

A. Of Mr. Dougherty.

Q. From aught that you could see, was the box in the same condition that it was when it had been locked up the night before?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. It was necessary for you to break this paper that was around it?

A. No; it was not necessary to break the paper —

Q. It didn't entirely surround the box, then?

A. No; it didn't entirely surround the box.

Q. Now, who were present that evening?

A. Well, there was a United States supervisor there and the United States marshal there, and Dale and Harrington and Lobdell and John Daly and myself, besides Dale's son.

Q. While you were engaged in this work did anybody else come there?

A. Yes; there were four or five other gentleman came there—Mr. Fassett, Mr. Wright, and two or three others.

Q. They were the Republican county committee?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did they proffer any advice?

A. Mr. Fassett wanted to know what we were doing. We told him that we were fixing our returns. He wanted to know if we had done anything with the ballots, and we told him we hadn't.

Q. What did you do there that night after you unlocked the box and got the ballots out again?

A. We then figured up our tally-sheet to see where the mistake was—to find out where the mistake was that had been made. Of course we couldn't touch the ballots or anything like that.

Q. Couldn't what?

A. We wouldn't touch the ballots after the first time that we pasted them on to a proof sheet.

Q. You must, of course, have got a sample of each kind of ballot and pasted them on the returns?

A. Oh, yes; we had to have that.

Q. And then didn't you ascertain how many of that kind had been cast?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Found out how many of each kind of ballot that you pasted on the returns had been cast?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. In order to ascertain that it was necessary to count all the ballots over, wasn't it?

A. Why, yes; we had to do that to have it prove up.

Q. And that was done?

A. That was done.

Q. Now, was your attention called to the fact that in a pile of Republican straight tickets two split tickets for Mr. Rockwell were found there that night?

A. Yes, sir; there were.

Q. Who discovered that?

A. Mr. Harrington discovered that when he took the wrapper off from the pile of tickets.

Q. Was your attention called to those tickets?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. You saw them?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you see that they came from a pile of Republican straights?

A. From a pile of Republican straight tickets; yes, sir.

Q. What was the aggregate number of votes as shown by the sample ballots that were cast for Mr. Rockwell?

A. One hundred and ten for Mr. Rockwell and 125 for Mr. Noyes.

Q. That was on the face of the returns?

A. That was on the face of the returns.

Q. Now, by the sample ballots how many appeared to have been cast for Mr. Rockwell and how many for Mr. Noyes?

A. One hundred and twelve for Mr. Rockwell and 123 for Mr. Noyes.

Q. Did you find other discrepancies as to other officers?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. From the time the board adjourned on Tuesday night up to the time you made this second count had this booth remained locked?

A. It had; yes, sir.

Q. And could you see that the ballots had been in any way interfered with or disturbed?

A. They had not been touched; nobody touched them at all.

Q. From the count you made there that night what do you say as to the result which you obtained from the sample ballots being the correct count of the votes for Representative in Congress?

A. I should say the correct count was 112 for Mr. Rockwell.

Q. As shown by the sample ballots?

A. As shown by the sample ballots.

Q. And 123 for Mr. Noyes?

A. And 123 for Mr. Noyes.

Q. As the returns were filed eventually, you didn't alter the face of them in any way from what they were written on the night of the election?

A. No, sir.

Q. That question was discussed somewhat, was it not?

A. Yes, sir.

It will be seen that this witness positively swears that the correct count of that box was 112 for Rockwell and 123 for Noyes. This would give 2 more votes for Rockwell and take 2 votes from Noyes, making a difference of 4. Now, if everything else was yielded for Noyes this would show that his majority was reduced to 2 votes. But we have seen that in the first district of the First ward the evidence showed that the inspectors made a mistake of 1 vote against Rockwell and 1 vote in favor of Noyes, which would make 2 for Rockwell; and this would have made the vote a tie. But in the second district, First ward, the evidence shows that they counted 4 ballots for Noyes that should have been counted for Rockwell, and this being correct would have given Rockwell a majority of 8. None of this evidence is either contradicted or impeached.

Patrick H. Stapleton, an inspector, third district, Fifth ward, was a Republican.

At this voting place the law was complied with so far as concerned the pasting of the ballot upon one return. He testifies, page 40, as follows:

Q. Did you assist in the counting?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was the ballot box, its contents emptied upon the table?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And the ballots divided up among you?

A. Yes; each took a pile.

Q. Did the number of ballots agree with the poll list?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Who acted as tally clerk?

A. Well, I couldn't say exactly; two or three of them kept a tally sheet of their own; then the clerk he kept a tally sheet, or tried to, at least.

Q. Who was that?

A. Mr. Dahoney.

Q. Did you count the straight tickets first?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And the split tickets afterwards?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. After the ballots had been counted were the returns made out then?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And signed?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Any sample ballots annexed to the returns, pasted on in any way, that night?

A. Yes, sir; there was one; one return; we had to make out three; we only made out one with sample ballots on.

Q. Now, was there indorsed on the back of each of the sample ballots the number of that kind that had been cast?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What was done with the remainder of the ballots?

A. Well, I couldn't say; I didn't keep any track of them.

And page 141:

Q. Well, what was done with the returns?

A. Why, Mr. Davis took them.

Q. Now, do you recollect ascertaining the next day that the clerk would not file the returns?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What was done then?

A. Reconvened the board.

Q. When?

A. I don't know whether it was the next day or the day after.

Q. Who were present when the board was reconvened?

A. The full board.

Q. Anybody else?

A. The United States supervisor.

Q. Mr. Rae, a Republican there, a Republican watcher?

A. Not at that time; he was on the night of the election.

Q. What did you do at this second meeting?

A. Made out two other reports.

Q. What did you do with the box containing the ballots?

A. It was left in the booth.

Q. Well, I know; but didn't you take it to get any ballots out of it?

A. Oh, yes.

Q. You unlocked it then?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Who did that?

A. I couldn't say.

Q. And what was done after you unlocked it and got the ballots out?

A. We took the ballots and pasted them on the two other sheets, to correspond with the one we had made out; the original one.

Q. And indorsed them in exactly the same way?

A. Yes, they had been indorsed previously; we had made out three returns and all ready to sign, but there was no sample ballots on but one.

Q. So you had to annex sample ballots on two of the returns and write on the back of the sample ballots the number that had been cast?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was that done right there?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And did the three returns then correspond?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Well, now, was it discovered there that there was any discrepancy between the face of the returns and the sample ballots?

A. Not at that time.

Q. How soon afterwards?

A. After they were offered for filing.

Q. Were you present when they were offered for filing?

A. Not at the time they were offered; I went up there, but I went out.

Q. Then what was done after you found there was that discrepancy?

A. Called the board together again to make good the discrepancy.

Q. What did you do at that meeting of the board?

A. We didn't do anything; somebody told us we had no legal right to change it, so we left them in their original state.

Q. And filed them just as they were?

A. Yes, sir; at least I suppose so; I wasn't over there.

Q. Now, do you recollect the number of votes that were cast for each candidate for Representative in Congress, as shown by the sample ballots?

A. By the same ballots—the back of the sheet?

Q. Yes.

A. I think it was 94 for Rockwell and 66 for Noyes, if I remember right; I won't be positive, though.

Q. Now, do you know what the face of the returns showed as the vote?

A. I think it was 87 and 73.

Q. Eighty-seven for Rockwell and 73 for Noyes?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Well, you participated in the count that was made?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And in the selection of the sample ballots that were first attached the night of election?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Which, in your opinion, was the correct count?

A. Why, I think the back of the sheet was correct; that the face of the returns were not correct.

Q. In order to get at the sample ballots and indorse upon the back of each of them the number of that kind cast, it was necessary on election night to find the number of each kind of ballot and count them, wasn't it?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And that was done?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And that number was written on the back of the sample ballot how many of that kind there were?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. So you can't see how any error could have crept in as to that way of counting?

A. No; but it seems as though it did.

Q. Not in getting at the number from the backs of the ballots; there was an error, as you understand, on the face of the returns in footing up the totals the other way?

Yes, sir.

It will be seen here that a Republican inspector testifies that the returns on the back of the sheet which gave Rockwell 94 votes and Noyes 66 votes was correct, and the face of the returns which gave Rockwell 87 votes and Noyes 73 votes was not correct.

In passing, let me here state that this evidence of a Republican inspector gives 7 additional votes for Rockwell and 7 less for Noyes, and this elects Mr. Rockwell beyond any question, and I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that Mr. Stapleton's evidence is not impeached, refuted, or contradicted in any way whatever. It will be observed that there was no recount at this box. The returns written on the ballots in compliance with section 42 of the code were made on the night of the election, and they show and the evidence shows clearly that Rockwell got 94 votes and Noyes 66.

The majority report gave Rockwell 87 votes and Noyes 73 votes. There is not a particle of evidence in the record to justify this. The only testimony on the subject is that the figures are not correct. The only thing that Congress has to determine in regard to this box is the number of votes which each candidate received.

Congress has got nothing to do with the returns. The only question before Congress is to determine the number of votes cast for each candidate as shown by the evidence before them, and all the witnesses testify that the count was correct which gave Rockwell 94 votes and Noyes 66 votes; and they testify that the count which gave Rockwell 87 votes and Noyes 73 votes was not correct.

As we have before stated, the majority report, made by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. O'FERRALL], only claims a majority of 6 for Noyes. Now, if every other point was yielded to Noyes, it will be seen that the evidence regarding this box would overcome the 6 majority claimed for Noyes and give Rockwell a majority of 8. This shows there is no justification whatever for the action of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. O'FERRALL], the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LAWSON], and their six Republican colleagues in making a report by which they sought to deprive Mr. Rockwell of his seat and give it to his Republican opponent, Mr. Noyes. The majority have been repeatedly called upon to point to a single line or word of evidence contradicting this testimony, and they have been unable to do so.

All the evidence concurs that this count, upon which Mr. O'FERRALL bases his report, was made irregularly, illegally, and with undue haste.

The distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LAWSON], who opened this case, asserted that he believed these returns were changed, but I called upon him to point out a single word of evidence in the record to sustain this assertion, and he was unable to do it.

I will now read from a Republican's evidence (Mr. Stapleton, one of the inspectors), page 145, to show that they were not altered. It is as follows:

Q. But you have no reason to believe that any alteration was made by anybody, have you?

A. No, sir; I don't believe there was.

Q. Now, you recognized your own handwriting upon the back of each one of these tickets on the original returns, didn't you?

A. My name is not on the original returns.

Q. But you wrote on the back of the ticket that was pasted on the original returns the number of votes cast?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. That has not been disturbed in any way?

A. No, sir.

Q. Partly on the paper and partly on the ticket?

A. It was started on the top of each ticket and extended across the sheet.

Q. On the front?

A. Yes, sir.

The evidence shows that the returns from this precinct were taken by Mr. Davis, one of the inspectors, who testifies in regard to them as follows, pages 149 and 150:

Q. What was done with the returns?

A. They were placed into a box; one of the ballot boxes.

Q. Was that locked up?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you take the key?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What did you do with the box?

A. It was left right there in the polling place.

Q. In whose charge?

A. In charge of Grant Miller, who was one of the Republican inspectors.

Q. Now, the next day did you get the returns?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What did you do with them?

A. Took them over to the county clerk's office.

Now, in order to unseat Mr. Rockwell the majority of the Committee on Elections, six of them being Republicans, ask us to presume that these returns were tampered with, and yet the evidence shows that they were made out and sworn to be correct by one Republican (Stapleton) and that they were left in charge of another Republican (Grant Miller).

The evidence of James H. Kane and Charles B. Davis with regard to the Third district, Fifth ward, is quite similar to that of Mr. Stapleton's.

Mr. Kane testifies, page 148, as follows:

Q. When they got through with making the canvass, then the next thing in order was the pasting on of these sample ballots, wasn't it?

A. Yes, sir.
 Q. Now, who singled them out or selected them for Mr. Stapleton to paste on?
 A. Well, that was the Republican inspector.
 Q. And he took them and pasted them on?
 A. Yes, sir.
 Mr. Davis testifies, page 149, as follows:
 Q. Were the returns made out that night?
 A. Yes, sir.
 Q. Was there a sample ballot of each kind of ballot cast annexed to one of the returns?
 A. One of the returns.
 Q. Who did the actual writing on the ballots that were affixed to that return?
 A. A young man—Stapleton.
 Mr. Davis also swears (page 151) as follows:
 Q. You filed the returns as they were finally?
 A. Yes, sir.
 Q. Now, in annexing the sample ballots what do you say as to whether the sample ballots showed truly the vote for Congressmen; the back of the returns?
 A. I think they did; every reason to believe it.
 Q. From the time that that original return was made election night and the ballots pasted thereon, was that original return changed in any manner whatever from the time it was filed in the clerk's office?
 A. I don't think it was possible.

He also testified as follows, page 154:
 Q. Mr. Miller, then, was in possession of the whole thing?
 A. Yes, sir.
 Q. And he is the Republican inspector?
 A. Yes; a nice man, too.
 Q. Now, Mr. Davis, had these returns been disturbed in any way that you could see?
 A. I will swear not.
 Q. Now, you didn't ever discover any discrepancy between the face of the returns and the backs, but it was discovered by the county clerk or one of his deputies, who informed you?
 A. Yes, sir.

James P. Holliday was inspector of the fourth district, Sixth ward. He testified (page 156) as follows:
 Q. How was the count made on election night as to being done hurriedly or otherwise?
 A. I think we hurried through pretty fast.
 Q. On this recount, when you got the number of each kind of ballots, how was that done?
 A. Well, we took our time at that time.
 Q. Was it done carefully?
 A. Yes, sir.
 Q. What do you say, from your participation in the work, as to whether it was done correctly the second time?
 A. I think it was.
 Q. To ascertain correctly the number of each kind of ballot?
 A. Yes, sir.
 Q. Who actually wrote upon the ballots the number of each kind cast?
 A. William Clark.

George D. Wright, chairman board of inspectors, fourth district, Sixth ward, testifies as follows, page 160:
 Q. This second meeting that you had, where you ascertained the number of each kind of ballot, was that carefully made?
 A. Yes, sir.
 Q. And you participated in that work?
 A. I did.
 Q. What do you say as to whether, in your judgment, you arrived, at that second meeting, at the correct result as to the number of votes that had been cast for each candidate?
 A. Well, now, we didn't compare the ballots with the—
 Q. I understand; but what do you say as to the result being correct that second time?
 A. According to the ballots cast I should say they were correct.
 Q. Each kind of ballot was carefully counted?
 A. Yes, sir.

We see here two witnesses testifying positively that they counted ballots at first hurriedly; that they then counted them carefully and found that they had made a mistake in the first count by giving eight too many votes to Noyes and eight too few to Rockwell. Messrs. O'FERRALL, LAWSON, and their six Republican colleagues on the committee insist upon the incorrect count, which makes a difference against Rockwell of sixteen votes. There is no excuse or palliation for this. It will be seen that, yielding everything else to Mr. Noyes, and giving Mr. Rockwell what he is entitled to at this box, Mr. Rockwell is elected.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. McCREARY. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] be allowed fifteen minutes more. He thinks he can finish in that time.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Mr. Speaker—
 Mr. TRACEY and Mr. MONTGOMERY objected.
 Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Does my colleague [Mr. COBB] object to my going on?

Mr. COBB of Alabama. I do not know yet. If this time is not to come out of the time of the majority side—

Mr. TRACEY. I withdraw my objection.
 The SPEAKER. Objection is made by the gentleman from Kentucky on the right [Mr. MONTGOMERY].

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I ask to be heard in my own time. I have spoken thus far in the time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BACON].

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. COBB], a member of the committee, who desires to address the House.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Then I ask unanimous consent to print the rest of my remarks.

Mr. BURROWS. I think we ought to know what these remarks are to be.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Well, they are—

Mr. BURROWS. I think I shall have to object for the present.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. I hope the time of the gentleman from Alabama will be extended ten minutes.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MONTGOMERY]. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. COBB] is recognized.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Has there been any division of time agreed upon by the minority and majority members of the committee?

The SPEAKER. None that the Chair is aware of.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Then why is not the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] entitled to recognition?

The SPEAKER. Because the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. COBB], the member of the committee who filed the views of the minority, desired to address the House, and was recognized.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. I understood the temporary occupant of the chair yesterday to rule on a point of order which was made, that a gentleman who obtained the floor, whether he belonged to the committee or not, was entitled to be heard.

The SPEAKER. Undoubtedly, but the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] had not the floor except for fifteen minutes, which he has exhausted.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] having addressed the Chair, for the purpose of taking the floor in his own right before the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. COBB] did—

The SPEAKER. But not being recognized by the Chair, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] is not entitled to the floor. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. COBB] is recognized.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Before I proceed, Mr. Speaker, if my colleague from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] wants fifteen minutes, I am willing, if the objection made by other gentlemen is withdrawn. When I addressed the Chair, I simply wanted to make a statement as to the condition of this matter.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi (to Mr. COBB of Alabama). Yield him fifteen minutes.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. I do not want to yield the gentleman my own time.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Why not? Your time is unlimited.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. No, it is not.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Why not?

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Because there has been no agreement; and I am entitled to only an hour. If the House will agree to give me fifteen minutes afterward—

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi (to Mr. COBB of Alabama). Trust to the generosity of the House.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I believe it is agreed that I may go on.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. COBB]. If he yields to his colleague—

Mr. COBB of Alabama. I yield my colleague from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] fifteen minutes.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I am very much obliged to my colleague—

Mr. HAUGEN. Inasmuch as the time of the gentleman from Alabama has been extended, I would like to ask him a question in connection with what he was saying a few moments ago.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Certainly.

Mr. HAUGEN. The gentleman stated, when criticising the report of the Committee on Elections, that the opinion of Judge Barnard in the case of the people of the State of New York vs. The board of canvassers of Dutchess County was reversed.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Yes, sir; on the merits of the case.

Mr. HAUGEN. I have before me the decision of the supreme court in that case showing that it was affirmed.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. That is on technical grounds.

Mr. HAUGEN. Not only was the decision affirmed on technical grounds, but in the decision before me I find this language:

We think, however, that the quashing of the writ was right upon the merits, even had it been regularly issued upon notice.

And turning over to the end of the decision I find these words: Order affirmed.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Judge Barnard's decision, so far as it affects the question we are discussing, was reversed by the supreme court, but since the gentleman has called attention to this matter I want to criticize for a moment right here a report which he has submitted in this case. While all the rest of the committee advocate throwing out the two bribed votes for Noyes, the proof being positive that they were bribed and that they were given to the voter by one of Noyes's workers, the gentleman himself, true to Republican principles, asserts that there is not an iota of evidence here to establish that they should be rejected.

Mr. HAUGEN. The gentleman I think misunderstands. I contend that there is nothing tending to show that they were cast for Noyes.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Yet you know that they were given to the men who voted them by one of Noyes's workers, and were paid for by him, and that is pretty good evidence that they were cast for him.

Mr. HAUGEN. But there is no evidence of that fact, I contend. Why did you not ask the witnesses whether they voted for Mr. Noyes or not, if you wanted to go into that matter?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. The proof was positive that these two men were bribed voters, and that they were bribed to vote by the corruptionist McArthur. They were corrupt men and criminal, and yet the gentleman from Wisconsin insists that Mr. Rockwell should let his case rest upon the evidence of these two corrupt men. I will read the exact language of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HAUGEN] in his report:

I agree with the views of the committee except as to its action in deducting from the total number of votes cast for Noyes 2 votes, as having been cast by Sheridan and Green, for the reason that these voters were bribed to vote the Republican ticket. There is nothing in the evidence to show that either Sheridan or Green voted for Noyes or voted the Republican ticket.

But, Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to consume my time in this colloquy with the gentleman from Wisconsin.

I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that in the third district of the Fifth ward of the city of Elmira there was no recounting, but on the night of the election the officers having counted the ballots and made their returns, proceeded immediately to paste the sample ballots on the returns and to write upon them, and on the returns, as required by law, the number of ballots cast of that kind. According to that return so made up and certified Noyes received 66 and Rockwell 94 votes. According to the returns on the inside Rockwell received 87 votes and Noyes 73. That question was before the court, and I admit that the court passed, not on the question as presented by the ballots in this district, but upon the question presented by the other districts where the count was made the night afterwards.

The court of appeals says:

In our opinion the statement made on the night after the election must control the action of the county commissioners.

But the court says:

It is claimed that the actual result at the polls was different in fact from that shown by this statement that question must be left for the determination of another tribunal.

But even with regard to them, the only Democrat I believe on that court says, as this House will see, that the evidence presented from the returns on the outside was more likely to be accurate, and should have been taken rather than the returns on the inside. Judge Earl says in the decision, in deciding the case:

There is certainly ground for claiming—

This is Judge Earl, the most eminent judge in New York; a man so eminent that he was voted for by both political parties and no man appeared in the race against him.

Mr. O'FERRALL. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Yes, sir.

Mr. O'FERRALL. I understand you to say that this gentleman is the only Democratic judge on the court of appeals upon the bench in the State of New York.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Well, I may be incorrect about that.

Mr. O'FERRALL. That was your statement.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. O'FERRALL. I want to inform the gentleman that five out of the seven who compose the judges of that court are Democrats.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Well, Judge Earl is the most eminent of them all. He says:

There is certainly ground for claiming that a detailed statement made up of the numbers of each kind of the ballots was more reliable than the general statement composed of totals reached by adding up the ballots. The general statement must have been reached by adding up the votes contained in all the ballots of every kind, and there is one chance of error, that of mistakes in addition, which is absent from the detailed statement.

He therefore says that these returns on the outside are more reliable than the returns on the inside, and the evidence shows that these returns were kept by Grant Miller, a Republican inspector, and yet the gentlemen who argue this case assert, and the report of the committee asserted, that the returns made may have been, and probably were, changed during the period between the night of the election and the next day. But yet when I come to examine the evidence I find that these returns were in the custody and safe-keeping of a Republican inspector.

Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey. And consequently were safe.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Certainly they were safe from being changed to benefit a Democrat.

Now, Mr. Speaker, with all of this evidence showing that these returns on the outside were the correct returns, ten witnesses testifying to that, and not one testifying otherwise, and it being admitted that this House must decide this case upon evidence, I ask any member how he can bring his conscience to decide a case in favor of contestant, without one particle of evidence to sustain it, when we have ten, most of them possibly Democrats, but a minority of Republicans, all testifying that the returns on the outside, which elected Rockwell, were correct and reliable and that the others were not?

And Mr. Stapleton, a Republican, in the third district, testifies emphatically that he wrote the returns on the outside, and that those present the correct returns of the votes cast that day, and that the returns inside do not report the correct returns of the votes cast that day. And taking that box alone, admitting everything else for the contestant, Mr. Rockwell is elected by at least 12 votes.

Without a particle of evidence to sustain them, the men who are responsible for this report attempt to excuse themselves by stating that it is possible that a fraud was practiced in favor of Mr. Rockwell. It is absolutely absurd to suppose that six different inspectors of each of the six districts would at the same time conceive of carrying out the same character of fraud. It is also ridiculous to suppose that if a man determined to commit a fraud he would do it on a scale so small.

Now, there is another question which I can not discuss very fully, as to these Doyle ballots. The statutes of New York stated at that time that a ballot with a mark on it was illegal and that anyone who voted it should be punished.

The exact language of the law is:

No voter shall place any mark upon his ballot by means of which it can be identified as the one voted by him.

Whoever shall violate any provision of this section shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.

Now, gentlemen come and argue that because the law did not say at that time that such ballots should be rejected, they were rightfully counted. There could not be a more erroneous principle of law laid down than that. Judge Cooley and Sedgwick and other great writers upon law lay down the principle in this wise: They say it makes no difference whether the statute says they shall be rejected or not. I refer now to page 605 of Cooley on Constitutional Limitations. They say that in those States which say a ballot is illegal and must be rejected, that the part of the law which says they must be rejected is simply declaratory of a constitutional principle, and that where a law says that a ballot is illegal it is the duty of the election officers to reject it whether the law says it shall be done or not.

Judge Cooley says (Constitutional Limitations, page 604):

The mode of voting in this country at all general elections is almost universally by ballot. The distinguishing feature of this mode of voting is that every voter is thus enabled to secure and preserve the most complete and inviolable secrecy in regard to the persons for whom he votes, and thus escape the influences which, under the system of oral suffrage, may be brought to bear upon him, with a view to overbear and intimidate, and thus prevent the real expression of public sentiment. In order to secure as perfectly as possible the benefits anticipated from this system, statutes have been passed in some of the States which prohibit ballots being received or counted unless the same are written or printed upon white paper, without any mark or figures thereon intended to distinguish one ballot from another.

After giving this statement of the system, Judge Cooley proceeds to use this emphatic language, page 605:

These statutes are simply declaratory of a constitutional principle that inheres in the system of voting by ballot, and which ought to be inviolable, whether declared or not. In the absence of such a statute, all devices by which party managers are enabled to distinguish ballots in the hands of the voter, and thus determine whether he is voting for or against them, are opposed to the spirit of the Constitution, inasmuch as they tend to defeat the design for which voting by ballot is established.

The same principle is laid down in Sedgwick on Statutes, page 71. He says:

We have also to notice the rule that if a statute inflicts a penalty for doing an act, the penalty implies a prohibition and the thing is unlawful, though there be no prohibitory words in the statute.

I can not discuss these Doyle ballots very fully, but I will assert that the evidence conclusively shows that every one of these 16 ballots had upon it a mark by which it could be identified from every other ballot cast at that election.

No lawyer can possibly contend that these Doyle ballots should be counted; and if they are rejected, as they should be, the case is bound to be decided in favor of Rockwell.

As the committee can not answer us on this point they endeavor to meet it by 23 ballots cast for Rockwell all of which had a figure 8 in one corner.

I submit that the majority committed a great error in their effort by which they seek to use this alleged evidence as an argument to prevent, if possible, the rejection of the grossly illegal Doyle ballots which were cast for Mr. Noyes. It is a gross injustice to class the 28 Rockwell ballots in the same category as the grossly illegal Doyle ballots. The difference is as great as the difference between night and day. The committee committed a serious error in not rejecting the 16 Doyle ballots from the count. Mr. Rockwell put them in issue in his answer to the notice of contest. He introduced positive and legal proof that the Doyle ballots were illegal ballots, and he went further and showed clearly that they were marked for corrupt purposes. He proved that they were marked by a party election manager working in the interests of Mr. Noyes, and whom the proof shows was engaged in buying votes for the contestant. These ballots should be rejected because the evidence sufficiently shows that they were bribed votes, and because the evidence positively shows they were marked in violation of the law; and above and beyond that, the proof is sufficiently conclusive that the marking was done for corrupt purposes.

But even if the 28 ballots had been in issue, and even if they were proved by legal evidence, the character of marks on these ballots does not make them illegal.

Even the decisions which the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. O'FERRALL] quotes makes the distinction between ballots like the 28 Rockwell ballots and the 16 illegal Doyle ballots.

With regard to ballots very similar to the 28 ballots, Judge Barnard says—I read from the majority report, pages 10 and 11:

Here were 31 ballots with only an ink mark on them—nothing whatever to show that there was any design in placing it there or that there was anything connected with the ballot signifying any intent on the part of the voters. You can't deprive these thirty-one men of their votes because they happened to have an ink mark on them.

It is singular that this very decision has something to say about votes very similar to the Doyle votes, that is, votes that were evidently marked with a design or scheme to carry out a plan of bribery.

Judge Barnard says:

As to the eighteen ballots in East Fishkill, there is more cause for hesitation. Here it may be claimed that a man has gone to the voter and said: "We have designed a scheme under which we will agree to pay you for your vote if the ballot marked with this particular name on it comes out of the box."

Under the law Mr. Noyes can not try the case upon any issue which is not made by his notice of contest. Mr. Noyes did not refer to the 28 Rockwell ballots in his notice of contest, therefore they can not come into the case. But in addition to that the evidence by which Mr. Noyes seeks to impeach these ballots was not taken legally. The law provides how the evidence shall be taken, and any evidence taken contrary to law is illegal, and such evidence should not be considered by the Committee on Elections. Under the law Mr. Noyes had forty days in which to take his evidence in chief. Then Mr. Rockwell had forty days in which to take evidence, and then Mr. Noyes had ten days in which he was authorized to take evidence only in rebuttal.

Now, on the last day of the ten days in which Mr. Noyes was authorized to take evidence only in rebuttal of the evidence taken by Mr. Rockwell, this contestant, Mr. Noyes, proceeded to and did take the evidence by which he sought to impeach the 28 ballots cast for Mr. Rockwell. As no question affecting the integrity of these ballots was put in issue by Mr. Noyes, for that reason alone this body has no right to give them any consideration, and we are also inhibited for the reason that there exists no legal evidence regarding them. For these reasons I submit that the two Democratic and six Republican members of the Committee on Elections who are responsible for the majority report committed a gross error in alluding to these ballots in their report.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have a number of cases here which the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] is afraid to have go into the RECORD—

Mr. BURROWS. Oh, no; I am not afraid to have them go into the RECORD.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. They are the decisions of State supreme courts on this very point.

Mr. BURROWS. I am not afraid of them at all.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Then let them go in.

Mr. BURROWS. I have no objection to them if they relate entirely to this case.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Entirely; so much so that they are conclusive of it, my friend. [Laughter.]

I will now give my friend from Michigan a little good New England law.

The laws of Massachusetts and Vermont do not make it a misdemeanor to cast a ballot different from what is prescribed.

The constitution of Massachusetts says:

Every member of the house of representatives shall be chosen by written votes.

In the case of Henshaw vs. Foster, 9 Pickering, 312, printed votes had been rejected. On appeal in the supreme court, Chief Justice Parker delivered the opinion of the court, saying:

If printed votes are not written votes within a fair construction of the terms of the constitution of the Commonwealth, the plaintiff's vote was rightly rejected.

The constitution of Vermont says:

The freemen of each town shall bring in their votes for governor with his name fairly written.

At an election held in Vermont printed votes were used.

In Temple v. Mead, 4 Vermont, 539, the question was brought before the supreme court of that State. The court said:

From the terms "fairly written" it has been supposed by some that no other vote could be received except those where the name of the person voted for was written with pen and ink. And if our decision is to be governed by the practice which probably prevailed at the time the constitution was adopted, and we are to suppose that the framers of that instrument meant to adopt that term as it was then understood in its ordinary acceptation, and intended to exclude every other species of writing, then indeed we must come to the conclusion that all votes must have the name of the person voted for written with pen and ink, and exclude every other species of writing, even that which is now so commonly used, writing with a pencil.

It will be observed that the constitutions of Massachusetts and Vermont do not say in mandatory terms that if the ballots are not written they must be rejected, but nevertheless the supreme judges of both of these law-abiding Commonwealths state that—

If printed votes are not written votes within a fair construction of the terms of the constitution of the Commonwealth the plaintiff's vote was rightly rejected.

Those judges took the broad view that laws must be obeyed, and if votes were cast which were not such as the law prescribed they must be rejected. The judges of those States are the jurists whose decisions are the foundation of much of the law of our country. They have been approved and followed by the new States all over the Union.

Those judges held that the laws of the Legislature must be sustained and upheld, and such teachings did much to instill in the people that respect for law which has been characteristic of the inhabitants of New England.

In Oregon there is no penalty for voting an illegal ballot, except that it shall not avail the candidate.

The law is not mandatory, yet the supreme court of that State decides that a ballot which does not conform to the statute shall not be counted.

Eighth Oregon Reports, pages 449, 500, 501:

Appellants * * * claim that the court below erred in holding that the inspectors rightly rejected the colored ballot.

The authorities cited to sustain this proposition are not in point. They perhaps sufficiently illustrate the principle governing the construction of statutes defining the duties of public officers as to their being mandatory or directory merely, and the reluctance of the courts to construe statutes providing the manner of elections so as to defeat the public will as through the ballot-box, but disclose no instance where a voter has been accorded the privilege of disregarding a plain provision of law intended to promote the purity and secure the independence of elections, even in depositing his vote.

Section 30, page 572, of the code of Oregon provides that—

All ballots used at any election in this State shall be written or printed on plain white paper, without any mark or designation being placed thereon whereby the same may be known or designated.

The voter in this instance is conclusively presumed to have had knowledge of this requirement, and to have had it in his power to comply with it by using a proper ballot.

It was a matter entirely under his own control, and if he chose to disregard the law he can not complain if the consequence was that his vote was lost.

The correct principle is announced in the case of Kerr v. Rhodes, 46 Cal., 398, which holds—

That a ballot cast by an elector in good faith should not be rejected for failure to comply with the law in matters over which the elector had no control, such as the exact size of the ticket, the precise quality of the paper, or particular character of type or heading used, where the law has provisions to that effect; but if the elector willfully neglect to comply with requirements over which he has control, such as seeing that his ballot when delivered is not so marked that it may be identified, the ballot should be rejected. (American Law of Elections, sec. 463.)

Ledbetter v. Hall, 62 Mo., 422. The code says:

It is the duty of the judges to cause to be placed on each ballot the number corresponding with the number of the voter offering the same, and no ballot not numbered shall be counted.

In this case the votes cast in Miller Township were not numbered. The court below and supreme court held they could not be counted, and this elected the contestant.

Mr. O'FERRALL. Now, if the gentleman will allow me, I simply want to call his attention to the case of Giddings vs. Clark, of the Third district of Texas, decided in the Forty-second Congress upon the unanimous report of the Committee on Elections, Democrats and Republicans, in which this language is used:

We think it plain that inasmuch as the statute which fixes a penalty for marking a ballot does not expressly declare that a marked ballot shall be thrown out, the board erred in rejecting the vote of this county upon this ground.

Now, sir, in a case from Virginia, of Mackenzie vs. Braxton, the unanimous report of the committee, Democrats and Republicans, was to the same effect.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. The question did not arise in either of those cases whether the ballots should be rejected on account of the principle of law which governs this case, and I think the gentleman does not state the case in all its bearings. As the gentleman states it, it would be an erroneous decision.

Mr. O'FERRALL. That was the precise point.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. But I say where such cases have arisen of late years, the courts have decided that illegal ballots should be rejected, whether there is a prohibition or not. Any other view of the case would be to decide that to cast an illegal ballot would send the voter to jail and the man voted for to Congress. No man will in this enlightened age contend for such an absurd construction of law.

I have the decisions here which show that the question involved in those cases has no application whatever to this case. In the case we are considering, the Doyle ballots were marked for an illegal purpose and the men that voted them willfully violated the law by voting marked ballots. In the cases of Giddings vs. Clark and Mackenzie vs. Braxton, the voters handed legal ballots to the inspectors and the inspectors or managers of the election marked the ballots after they had been voted. I read from the original report by Mr. McCreary, afterwards in Hayes's cabinet, and the author of a standard work upon elections:

By a reference to the statute here referred to, it will be seen that it is made a misdemeanor for any judge of election to place any number or mark upon the ticket of any voter; but it is not declared that the vote of a legally qualified voter shall be rejected because his ballot is marked by the judges. We should not be inclined to put a construction upon this statute which would enable an officer of election to destroy the effect of a ballot cast in good faith by a legal voter by placing a number or mark upon it. A ballot may be thus marked or numbered without the knowledge or consent of the voter, and it would be manifestly unjust that he should in this way be deprived of his vote.

Mr. McCreary, in making the report, recites the points in the case of Mackenzie vs. Braxton in these words:

The precise point was decided in the late case of McKenzie vs. Braxton, already quoted from, and in which the committee used the following language, which is entirely applicable to the facts in this case:

"In Virginia the law which was in force until near the time of this election required the ballots to be numbered. A short time prior to the election in question, this provision was repealed. It seems that at a few precincts the officers of election were not advised of this repeal, and consequently numbered the ballots as they had been in the habit of doing before."

It seems to me inexcusable for the Committee on Elections to cite these cases as applicable to the case now before the House. They will see that Judge McCreary rests his action in these cases solely on the ground that the ballots should not be rejected because they were legal ballots cast in good faith by legal voters, and to reject such a ballot would be enabling an officer of election to destroy a ballot cast in good faith. The difference between those cases and this case is as great as the difference between light and darkness.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Now I ask leave to print the rest of these decisions.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. BURROWS. What will be the character of the extension?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. It will be some of the evidence in this case and the decisions of the courts, which are conclusive of the case.

Mr. BURROWS. You say you wish to print the evidence. You might print the whole of it, and there are hundreds of pages of it.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. No; I wish to print very little of it; what I have prepared to speak upon and have alluded to, and it will not occupy three pages.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. FUNSTON. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. COBB of Alabama was recognized.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. COBB] be allowed to proceed without limit. Other members of the committee have had the same privilege.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

[Mr. COBB of Alabama withholds his remarks for revision. See Appendix.]

Mr. MAGNER. Mr. Speaker, in the Fifty-first Congress nine Democratic members of the House were expelled and eight Republican contestants were seated in their stead. This action was done under what was considered the stress of great political necessity, and the merits of the individual cases were little inquired into by the Committee on Contested Elections, and less considered by the House when brought before that body for judgment. The action of the last House of Representatives in this respect attracted widely the attention of the country, and the result proved disastrous to the principle of partisan determination in the contests between members as to their rights to seats in this House.

Profiting by the experience of our opponents in the last House, some of the Democratic members of this Congress, it seems to me, in their desire to show to the people of the country that they are not actuated by such base motives as prompted our Republican friends in the Fifty-first Congress, and that they can rise superior to party prejudices and party passions, go to the other extreme and select from the members of this House a victim whom they wish to immolate as a vicarious sacrifice to their strained notions of justice and right, and that they may pose before the people of the country as the possessors of superior political virtues.

The law under which the election in the Twenty-eighth Congressional district in the State of New York, from which this contest springs, took place on the 4th day of November, 1890, was conducted under what is known as the "ballot reform act." It is chapter 262 of the laws of the State of New York, of the year 1890, and is entitled "An act to promote the independence of voters at public elections, to enforce the secrecy of the ballot, to provide for the printing and distribution of ballots at public expense."

No legislative enactment in our time has received as much attention from legislators, from the public press, and from the people of the State of New York at large as did this famous enactment. It was for three years before the State Legislature of New York, being first adopted by one branch of that Legislature, then by the other, then by both; vetoed once or twice by the governor, and finally, after a great deal of discussion, when the merits of the measure were well displayed and when every section and line of the enactment were well understood or should have been well understood it became a law in 1890.

The object of this enactment was to prevent the debasement of the elector and the elective franchise, and this object was sought to be accomplished in two ways, (1) by printing and putting the ballots in the hands of the voter at public expense, and thus doing away with a form of corruption known as employing "workers" at the polls; and (2), by affording means to the voter of preventing others from knowing how he voted, and compelling him to use these means and see that no one should know.

These two predominating ideas course through every section of this act from the first to the forty-sixth, just as the hot blood courses through all the gates and alleys of the human body, and every word in the enactment from its very title to the date of its effect breathes with bated breath "secrecy." This enactment revolutionized the method of voting in the State of New York more thoroughly than any change ever proposed since the adoption of the plan of voting by ballot.

It revolutionized the rights of the voter and the rules of law laid down by the courts from time immemorial, by which those rights have for years been determined, for while it did not rob any citizen of his constitutional right to vote it placed upon him greater duties in the manner of its exercise and threw upon him as a prerequisite to its exercise the necessity of putting upon it the seal of absolute secrecy.

It was not enough under the provisions of this act that the voter should enjoy the privilege of concealing from the world the candidate for whom he voted, the law cast this upon him as a duty, imposed a penalty for the violation of it, and made it a prerequisite to the effective exercise of the right to vote.

All the provisions of this act requiring secrecy on the part of the elector are mandatory from the moment he enters the polling place until he has deposited his ballot in the box, and they all show that this was the intention of the Legislature when the law was enacted. The secret booths, with the conveniences for writing, in which, in the words of the law, "the voters may prepare their ballots screened from observation as to the manner in which they do so;" the guard rail excluding all persons 6 feet from the voter from the time he enters till he leaves; the provision requiring the voter to retire alone to one of the booths, there prepare his ballots, fold them so as to effectually conceal the contents of the ballots; and finally, to remain inside the booths for at least three minutes, though he may be ready to come out before that time has elapsed; all show that the act intends that the voter must use active vigilance, must be on his guard, must scrutinize and watch, and must be diligent to prevent anyone from knowing how or for whom he votes.

All these precautions he must observe before he deposits his ballot in the box or he can not exercise the right, and the election officers can prevent him. And in the same spirit the law provides that he who has escaped the vigilance of the election officers, or has acted against the spirit of the law where their vigilance could not detect him, and has succeeded in voting though violating the law by placing a mark upon his ballot by means of which it can be identified as the one voted by him, becomes by the very act guilty of a misdemeanor. And to say that the voter who has thus succeeded in defying the plain provisions of the law, who has overcome the scrutiny of the officers delegated to enforce it, and who has become guilty of a crime thereby, is entitled to have that vote recorded would be to suggest an easy method of defeating the fundamental purpose of the statute.

For the only ones knowing whether the voter marked his ballot for the purpose of afterwards identifying it are the voter himself and the person who receives the benefit of his shame. It is not to the interest of either of these persons that the truth shall be proclaimed, and these plain provisions of the statute would thereby become more mischievous than useful. As Chief Justice Ruger says in construing this act in People ex rel. Nichols vs. Canvassers of Onondaga County (41 New York State Report, 731):

It (the statute) imperatively requires that every ballot cast shall be of the same size, shape, color, and have the same indorsement. The purpose of the act seems to require that these provisions should be held to be mandatory and that a disregard of them upon any pretense whatever should constitute a violation of the law and cause a forfeiture of any benefit to be derived from such illegal ballots. The vigorous enforcement of these penalties is the principal mode by which obedience to the law was expected to be secured.

And again, referring to the effect of any different construction, and one looking to a record of the ballots not complying with the provisions of the law, at page 734 the same judge says:

The law so construed leaves the candidate confessedly elected by illegal ballots to avail himself of their aid in entrenching his position, so that, if he can ever be dislodged therefrom it can only be when the lawfully elected candidate is in the remote future enabled to prove the agency whereby the illegal transposition of ballots was accomplished, and the secret intent with which it was done. An act leading to such results might, we believe, be more appropriately termed a statute to encourage the violation of the right of elective franchise than one to protect and purify it.

Suppose that one of the other mandatory provisions of this act had been thus violated, and the elector had succeeded notwithstanding the vigilance and scrutiny of the election officers in getting his ballot in the box, for instance that he had used a green or a blue colored paper ballot, the law prescribing a white one, does anyone contend that his vote would be counted?

Mr. BLOUNT. Is there anything there about the color and shape of the ballots?

Mr. MAGNER. The question in this case was upon the indorsement on the ballot. The law in that case provided that the indorsement should be on the back, and that the number of the election district should be named in it. The county clerk of Onondaga County took the official Republican ballots that should have been given to the first district and put them in the Second, and those for the second he put in the first, and only Republican ballots were thus transposed. The effect of this transposition of Republican ballots was that when the voter left the secret booth with his ballot carefully folded, and the contents secured from observation, as he thought, if he had used one of the official Republican ballots provided by the election officers, the watcher could observe that he held in his hand a ballot with a wrong indorsement, that while he was voting in the first district he had an official Republican ballot indorsed as of the second district, and as the transposition was only of Republican ballots, the contents thereof, and the candidates voted for by the electors were as well known to the election officers as though the voters proclaimed them from the house-tops.

In that case the court decided that the provisions of this act were mandatory, and although this transposition of ballots was done by mistake, or inadvertence, and though the county clerk had been derelict in his duty, and these ballots transposed by mistake, notwithstanding the provisions of the act were mandatory on the voter, and the law cast upon him the duty of exercising active vigilance in carrying out its provisions requiring the secrecy of the ballot, and as the voter had not exercised that vigilance in seeing that he had a proper and a lawful ballot, he must suffer the penalty and lose all the benefit derived by him under the statute, to wit, the right to have his vote "with the distinguishing mark" counted, 1,252 votes of the duly qualified electors of the county were thus cast out.

This is the decision of the court of appeals on this very act, and on the fundamental principle embodied in it—the secrecy of the ballot.

Suppose that one of the mandatory provisions of this act had been thus violated, and the elector had succeeded, notwithstanding the vigilant scrutiny of the election officers in casting his ballot. For instance, that it was a green or a blue paper ballot while the law prescribed for a white one, does anyone contend that a vote of that character, having been deposited, would be counted?

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON], of the majority of the committee, yesterday in speaking of this provision in section 35 of the act, that no voter shall place any mark upon his ballot by means whereof it can be identified as the one voted by him and that he was guilty of a misdemeanor in so doing, declared as a proposition of law that these provisions did not make the vote void, and stated as his reasons therefor, that the Legislature in 1891 amended this act by adding to this section the words "that this ballot shall be declared void and of no effect," with another amendment to section 31 providing for the retention of such marked ballots to have their validity passed upon by the supreme court in mandamus proceedings, and for the first time was the right given to the board of canvassers to throw out these marked ballots.

These amendments, as a careful reading of them will show, had a directly opposite effect, and tended not to broaden and enlarge the powers of the board of canvassers in the matter of rejected marked ballots, but to curtail and restrict them. The measure in question was a novel law and its workings in 1890 when first tried were unknown. Various constructions had been given to all of its provisions, and that section preventing the marking of ballots and prescribing it a felony for a voter so to mark them was generally interpreted as giving to the local boards of canvassers the judicial functions of determining whether a ballot was marked, whether it was marked by the voter for the purpose of identification, and whether the ballot should be counted or rejected.

These were considered to be too large powers to repose in a board of canvassers generally composed of plain, unlearned men, and unfortunately too often of ignorant ones. The Legislature then in the following session amended this law by declaring unequivocally what had been generally conceded before, to wit: that these marked ballots should be void, and then by an amendment to section 31 took away from the board of canvassers the right so to declare them void and provided that they should be separated and preserved, and that in proper proceedings instituted in the supreme court the question of the marking, of the intention of the voter in so marking, and of the validity of the ballots, should be fully and fairly determined.

We quote the amendment in full showing this construction to be the only fair one that can be made.

SEC. 31. When an inspector of election or other election officer or duly authorized watcher shall, during a canvass of the votes, or immediately after the completion thereof, declare his belief that any particular ballot or paper affixed thereto has been written upon or marked in any way with the intent that the same may be identified, the inspectors shall write their names on the back thereof and attach it to the original certificate of canvass and include in said certificate a statement of the specific grounds upon which the validity of such ballot is questioned. * * * Such ballots shall be counted in estimating the results of an election, but within thirty days after the filing of the certificate declaring such result, a writ of mandamus may issue out of the supreme court against the board of canvassers or officers acting as such board, by whom the ballots were counted, upon the application of any candidate voted for at the election, to require a recount of the votes, and all questions relating to the validity of such ballots, and as to whether they were properly counted, shall be determined in such proceeding.

This, then, was the amendment of the Legislature of 1890, taking from the board of canvassers the judicial function which the act of 1890 gave them and reposing it in the supreme court, to be exercised by them in proceedings in mandamus to be undertaken within thirty days after the filing of the certificate.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MAGNER. Yes, sir.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I understand that in the case of the "Doyle" ballots it can be very readily ascertained who cast them, because they were canvassed and returned.

Mr. MAGNER. Yes, sir.

Mr. CRAWFORD. But how would it be if there was a contract between a party and the voter that this party was to put a certain sign or check-mark or a figure upon the ballot which the voter was to vote—in that case could it be ascertained, after the ballot was counted, whether or not the voter had voted that ballot according to agreement?

Mr. MAGNER. It is the privilege of any individual citizen to act as a watcher of the canvass of the vote, and if the man is present during the canvass and knows the mark that he himself placed upon the ballot, he has an opportunity to see that ballot come out as the canvassers are handling the vote.

Mr. CRAWFORD. But could he ascertain that fact after the ballots were counted and the result announced?

Mr. MAGNER. Under the law of New York, after the ballots are counted they are immediately destroyed, unless there are defective ballots which are attached to the return and sent to the county clerk's office for preservation.

Mr. CRAWFORD. But in this case these ballots were not destroyed.

Mr. MAGNER. The other ballots were destroyed. Some ballots were retained. I do not know whether these were retained under the law which provides for the retention of defective ballots, or not. I will say this, however, that in the State of New York this was the first time when this elective system was tried.

The officials were ignorant of some of its provisions, and inexperienced in the working of the act, and there was a great deal of friction in the trial of the new method at that election, and a good many mistakes were made both by the election officers and by the electors.

Mr. BAILEY. I wish to ask the gentleman a question. Is not this true on that point, that a ticket which was merely marked would not have to be filed as a sample ballot, and that therefore no man could know that that ballot had been delivered unless an election officer?

Mr. MAGNER. Not necessarily. Any person could ascertain it. The canvass of the ballots by the election officers in New York is done openly. There are present first, the election officers, the supervisors of election, and, in addition to those, there are certain "watchers" who are appointed under the provision of the law by any of the candidates. In addition the canvass, as I have said, is made open and above board, in public, and any citizen has the right to go there and witness the canvass, though it is not his right to handle the ballots. So it is the privilege of any person who knows that a ballot is marked and knows the mark to be present, and see it afterwards if he can identify it.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. What is the statute of New York as to identification? Does it make the ballot void?

Mr. MAGNER. That has been my contention, and I have cited the decision of the court of appeals to that effect. The words of the law are:

No voter shall place any mark upon his ballot by means of which it can be identified as the one voted by him.

In the same section it is also provided that—

Whoever shall violate any provision of this section shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Is there any decision of the New York courts to the effect that if the mark is placed upon the ballot not by the voter but by somebody else that makes the ballot void? The law which the gentleman has cited prohibits the voter himself from marking his ballot for identification; but suppose the voter does not do it, but some other person makes the mark—what is the effect?

Mr. MAGNER. Do you mean where some other person makes the mark and the voter takes that ballot and casts it knowingly.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. MAGNER. Why, then, the voter makes the mark his own. It needs no decision of a court to sustain that proposition; it is elementary.

Mr. COCKRAN. Certainly, and he is liable to go to the penitentiary for it.

Mr. MAGNER. For instance, in this case Donald McArthur writes the name "A. Doyle" upon the ballot in place of Robert Earl a real candidate, and gives it to the voter and the voter takes it knowingly and votes that marked ballot; by doing so that mark becomes the act of the man who votes the ballot, and he takes all the consequences of the act as though it were in his own handwriting.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Now, is there any statute or any decision of the New York courts which makes the proposition which the gentleman has just stated the law of New York?

Mr. MAGNER. The whole act to which I have referred has been adjudicated by the court of appeals in a decision rendered last December; and in that adjudication, while the court does not touch directly upon this identical section, it does touch upon another section of like character. The court refers to the whole general spirit of the law and to the fundamental principles involved therein. In the prevailing opinion of the court, written by the chief justice, speaking of some provisions which would include this one, Chief Justice Ruger says:

It—

Meaning the statute—

imperatively requires that every ballot cast shall be of the same size, shape, color, and have the same general indorsement. The purpose of the act seems to require that the provisions should be held to be mandatory, and that a disregard of them upon any pretense whatever should constitute a violation of the law and cause a forfeiture of any benefit to be derived from such illegal ballots. The vigorous enforcement of the provisions of these penalties is the principal mode by which obedience to the law was expected to be secured.

Mr. O'FERRALL. The point in question here was not before the court?

Mr. MAGNER. It is the same statute.

Mr. O'FERRALL. I understand that.

Mr. MAGNER. And the fundamental principle involved in this decision is the same as that involved in the construction of this particular section.

Mr. O'FERRALL. I want to know whether the court makes the decision that the ballot must be rejected.

Mr. MAGNER. Yes; and the court did reject the ballot in this particular case—it rejected 1,252 ballots upon a mistake of the county clerk of the county of Onondaga.

Mr. BUSHNELL. Will the gentleman please mention the name of the case and the report?

Mr. MAGNER. It is the case of the People ex rel. Nichols vs. The Canvassers of Onondaga County. It is reported in 129 New York Reports, and also in 41 New York State Reports. The decision to which I refer is the opinion of the court, written by the chief justice, Judge Ruger.

In this same opinion, referring to a proposed construction of it, the effect of which would be merely the punishment of the offender and at the same time hold the ballot by him cast a valid vote, and the argument thereupon that such a construction should be adopted, if possible, in this case, as it would prevent the voter from being disfranchised, the court says:

The law so construed leaves the candidate confessedly elected by illegal votes to avail himself of their aid in intrenching his position, so that if he can be dislodged therefrom it can only be when the lawfully elected candidate in the remote future is enabled to prove the agency whereby the illegal transposition of ballots was accomplished and the intent with which it was done. An act leading to such results might, we believe, be more appropriately termed a statute to encourage the violation of the right of elective franchise rather than one to protect and to purify it.

Now, apply these same legal principles in construing this particular section. The section provides that—

No voter shall place any mark upon his ballot by means of which it can be identified as the one voted by him. * * * Whoever shall violate any of the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor.

Suppose, now, we adopt any other construction than that these ballots are illegal and invalid and can not be counted, of what effect are those provisions in the section? The section says that he who marks a ballot shall be guilty of a misdemeanor. Of what effect is this provision unless you visit upon the man who does this illegal act the penalty of having his ballot declared invalid and forfeited?

Mr. O'FERRALL. You can punish him for the misdemeanor.

Mr. MAGNER. How can you punish him? The only persons who know of the violation of law are the man who buys the sacred honor of the voter and the man who sells it. Is it to the credit of anybody for these parties to give to the world, the one the proof of his own turpitude, the other the proof that he has profited by it? How can you prove this violation of law in any way except by the testimony of the man who sells his vote and the man who purchases it? The act not being susceptible of proof in any other way, of what effective use are these words in the statute which was enacted for the purpose of guarding the ballot and protecting the elector in the exercise of his franchise?

Mr. RAYNER. Will the gentleman allow me a suggestion?

Mr. MAGNER. Certainly.

Mr. RAYNER. Is it not the uniform opinion of the text-writers on this subject that where the law makes an act of this kind a misdemeanor the ballot, if voted for the purpose of identification, is void?

Mr. MAGNER. Under these provisions of law—

Mr. RAYNER. Outside of the provisions of the statute, I want to give the gentleman a citation of three lines from the work of Sedgwick on this subject, which I think will clear up a good deal of confusion in reference to this question. He says:

We have also to notice the rule that if the statute inflicts a penalty for doing an act, the penalty implies a prohibition, and the thing is unlawful though there be no prohibitory words in the statute.

Now, does not that cover exactly the case in point?

Mr. MAGNER. Undoubtedly; and I say, what is more, to the majority of the committee—I say the act was so construed by the people of the State of New York, and by the electoral officers in the various election precincts in that election of 1890; and I say that the amendment of the Legislature adopted in the year 1891 to the preceding act was adopted to overcome the effects of just such a construction of this act, and to prevent the great possible dangers that followed such a construction.

You will observe, of course, that the majority of the election officers in the various precincts in any of the States must of necessity be selected from the unlearned and plain people. These men are not and should not necessarily be men learned in the law. The amendment of 1891 to the act robs the local boards of election canvassers of the powers as judicial officers which the act of 1890 allowed and commanded these men to exercise, to wit, the right of determining whether the ballot was marked, who marked it, how it was marked, if it was marked for purposes of identification, and then of determining in a judicial way that this ballot so marked was void, or that the individual who had marked it was guilty of a misdemeanor. And the Legislature in 1891 adopted this amendment, which declared in express terms the same provision here, with the addition that such ballots should be void and of no effect.

They first settled all question as to whether the ballots so marked should be valid and be counted, and then took from the boards of canvassers the right so to declare, as they had done the year before, but provided that they should make a statement of the facts and preserve the marked ballots while they destroyed the others, and return the marked ballots to the county clerk, specifying all of the facts in relation to them, and then allow any person who was interested in the election as a candidate or otherwise to go before the supreme court in mandamus proceedings and there have the court determine whether the ballots were marked and were illegal or legal, and whether or not they should be counted. The amendment enacted in 1891 took away, as I have said, the right which this law gave to the local board of canvassers in the election districts, and it is an historical fact that they exercised that power in 1890, the year this election took place.

Mr. RAYNER. Will the gentleman permit a further brief interruption?

Mr. MAGNER. Certainly.

Mr. RAYNER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON], in his remarks on yesterday, cited a statute just passed in the State of New York.

Mr. MAGNER. It is the same one whose provisions I have just been discussing.

Mr. RAYNER. The act of 1891 makes such a ballot void without guilty intent on the part of the voter; but that intent must be shown under the old law. As I understand the present law of New York, the difference between the statute of then and now, the present law makes such ballot void whether the intent is shown or not.

Mr. MAGNER. This is the same, and the very same provision. The provisions of the act are the same, and instead of the act of 1890 being enlarged by this amendment, it was restricted and cut down and the rights and duties of election officers under it were, instead of being enlarged, curtailed and despoiled. The questions they formerly determined under the act of 1890 were relegated to the supreme court by the new law.

Mr. RAYNER. Precisely.

Mr. MAGNER. Now let us apply the principles enunciated by the court of appeals of the State of New York on this identical statute to the facts presented here. Apply them, if you will, to the Doyle ballots. Here we have 16 ballots, marked "A. Doyle," "B. Doyle," "C. Doyle," etc., down the series in alphabetical order, all, according to the undisputed testimony, having the name Doyle, with the letters of the alphabet prefixed, written in lead pencil in the handwriting of one Duncan McArthur, a Republican worker and bribe-giver.

The name Doyle being a fictitious person whose name was voted for as a candidate for judge of the court of appeals over the name of Robert Earl erased on all these ballots. The name of the Republican contestant is voted for on all of them, and these 16 ballots gave him his plurality of 6 votes.

The gentleman from Georgia, Judge LAWSON, who opened the discussion on behalf of the contestant, admitted in his argument that these marks were made on the ballots for the purpose of identification when they should appear in the canvass of the votes. He admitted that; and who can doubt the truth of that fact who recalls the character of the parties, and all the circumstances attending the transaction. It is so evident that I will not presume on the ignorance of my hearers to rehearse the facts and enter an argument for the purpose of proving it.

Now, these 16 ballots can not, under the provisions of this act and the decision of the court in the State of New York in regard to them, be counted in favor of the contestant in this case.

It is agreed by all the members of the Committee on Elections who report in favor of the contestant that upon all the equities in this case, giving to each man that which he is entitled to equitably on the facts of the case, that there is only a plurality of 6 votes in favor of the contestant here, that Col. Noyes at that election received only 6 more votes than his Democratic competitor, the sitting member, and that that meager plurality is partly made up by counting in his favor the 16 marked Doyle ballots.

I hold that it is unnecessary for us to prove either bribery, fraud, or corruption in this case. It is sufficient for us to prove that these 16 ballots were marked as forbidden by the law; and we, as the court of last resort, to whom has been referred the determination of this contest, have the right to exercise, and should, in justice, in equity, and in right, determine that these 16 ballots should not be counted for the contestant here, and that the sitting member is still elected by a plurality of 10 votes. That is the law as determined by the court of appeals of the State of New York. It is sufficient for us to exercise it, and to declare that the contestant should hold his seat in this House.

Mr. COX of Tennessee. Will the gentleman allow me to ask his attention to a matter right there?

Mr. MAGNER. Yes, sir.

Mr. COX of Tennessee. Will you be kind enough to give us your view in regard to the mark that was put on the 28 ballots cast for Rockwell.

Mr. MAGNER. The gentleman from Tennessee has reminded me that it is claimed in this case that 28 ballots were cast for Mr. Rockwell, which under a like determination should not be counted for him by us. I first must refer to these ballots by stating that the question as to them does not properly belong to the record here.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. O'FERRALL] in interrogating the gentleman who last spoke here [Mr. COBB of Alabama] stated that the contestee in his pleadings in this case, in the answer to the contestant's notice of contest, did not specify any allegation whereby these 16 Doyle ballots should be a subject of controversy here.

Mr. O'FERRALL. Not as marked ballots.

Mr. MAGNER. I tell the gentleman that the pleadings do allow that question to come in, and I refer to the record in this case to show the same. On page 9 of the record, in his answer, the contestee says:

And the said Hosea H. Rockwell further alleges that the said Henry T. Noyes, at or about the time of his nomination for Representative in Congress in said district, paid and contributed to the Republican managers in the four counties comprising said district, or caused to be paid to said managers either directly or indirectly the sum of $10,000, and that thereafter the said Henry T. Noyes paid and contributed or caused to be paid and contributed directly or indirectly at various times large sums of money to the said Republican managers in said four counties, amounting to the additional sum of $10,000 with the intent and purpose to bribe the electors in said counties who would otherwise have voted for the said Hosea H. Rockwell, to vote for the said Henry T. Noyes for said office at said election and to refrain from voting for the said Hosea H. Rockwell for said office at said election, and that other and additional large sums of money were paid and contributed by other persons with the intent and purpose last aforesaid, and that the sums of money paid and contributed as aforesaid were used, employed, and paid by the said Henry T. Noyes and his personal and political friends to a great number of voters in said counties, comprising said Twenty-eighth Congressional district, to induce such voters to vote for the said Henry T. Noyes for said office or to refrain from voting for the said Hosea H. Rockwell for said office or to induce such voters to come to the polls or to remain away from the polls at such election, and large sums of such money were also paid to many of said voters as a consideration for and on account of such voters having refrained from voting for said Hosea H. Rockwell or having voted for said Henry T. Noyes, or both, or having come to the polls or remained away from the polls at such election.

I now inform the gentleman that under the pleadings in this case every one of these 16 ballots was perfectly material and competent evidence to prove the fact that there had been corruption of the voters, and that Noyes and his friends had paid voters for the purpose of voting corruptly at that election, and that these ballots, marked as they were—and one of them I believe proved to have been paid for by one of Mr. Noyes's friends—were material and competent evidence under this allegation. And having been admitted in evidence-in-chief in this case, being evidence in the case for one purpose, they can be used for any purpose for which the application of them can be made.

Mr. O'FERRALL. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. MAGNER. Certainly.

Mr. O'FERRALL. The point that I made was this: That there is no charge whatever in the answer of contestee in regard to the marked ballots. There is a general charge here of bribery and of fraud, but there is no specific charge and no general charge as to marked ballots.

Mr. MAGNER. But there is a charge as to bribery, and these ballots tending to prove that fact were put in the record as evidence of that fact, and being in evidence for that purpose can be used as proof for any purpose in the case. That is a familiar rule of law and of evidence, and the gentleman is too good a lawyer not to be aware of that.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Is there any statement in the pleadings on either side which makes a distinct issue either as to the 16 Doyle ballots or as to the 28 marked ballots which now appear in this case?

Mr. MAGNER. No, sir; there is no distinct allegation as to either.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. There is nothing in the pleadings which alleges anything specifically either about the 16 Doyle ballots or the 28 marked ballots which are alleged to have been cast for Mr. Rockwell?

Mr. MAGNER. No, sir.

Mr. STOUT. Are we strictly confined to the pleadings here, as jurors in this case?

Mr. MAGNER. I think we should be confined to the record.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. There is in the pleadings no allegation which makes an issue as to these marked ballots as marked ballots? These matters are altogether to be found in the proof?

Mr. MAGNER. That is the fact.

Mr. BUTLER. I wish to ask the gentleman a question, in order to cover this whole case. Is there any allegation in the contestant's first notice of fraud or bribery on the part of the contestee?

Mr. MAGNER. As I understand it he makes the whole case upon the certificate, upon the decision of the court of appeals awarding him the certificate of election on the question of counting the returns in six election districts.

Mr. O'FERRALL. I will say this, that in my view of the case there is no allegation to sustain either the consideration of the 28 marked ballots for Rockwell or the 16 marked ballots for Noyes; that under the strict pleadings in this case neither can be considered.

Mr. MAGNER. But the gentleman must remember this, that the 16 marked ballots were properly put in evidence, and no objection was made to their admission.

Mr. O'FERRALL. So were the 28.

Mr. MAGNER. They were put in in rebuttal, and no opportunity was given the contestee in this case to controvert or refute the testimony, or to explain them; they were put in under objection, and there was a motion made to strike out the testimony.

Mr. O'FERRALL. If my friend will allow me, I will state that it has been the custom of the Committee on Elections, and in most of the courts, to allow documents to be filed at any time. Now, this was in the nature of documentary evidence, and even in the event that the attorney for Mr. Rockwell had been given until doomsday, it would have made no difference.

Mr. MAGNER. If an opportunity had been given Mr. Rockwell he could possibly have procured, in opposition, the men who voted these ballots to explain whether there was any mark there that they intended for the purpose of identification; and if there was, and it was proven in this case that these ballots were corruptly put in, then the same rule would apply, and they would have to be rejected.

Mr. O'FERRALL. That does not answer the question I asked.

Mr. MAGNER. I hope it does. It is as near as I can get to it.

Mr. COCKRAN. Will the gentleman from Virginia permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. O'FERRALL. I have not the floor.

Mr. MAGNER. I will yield to the gentleman to ask a question.

Mr. COCKRAN. I want to put a question to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. O'FERRALL]. Is it not a fact that Mr. Rockwell, when the testimony was received upon these 28 ballots, offered his objection, and made a motion to strike out the evidence?

Mr. O'FERRALL. Made a motion? Where, in the committee?

Mr. COCKRAN. As to the 28 ballots, in the committee.

Mr. O'FERRALL. Oh, yes.

Mr. COCKRAN. And that the motion has never been denied.

Mr. O'FERRALL. It has never been acted upon.

Mr. COCKRAN. And never denied. Now, I ask the gentleman if, in a proceeding in a court, or anywhere where a controversy is to be decided by testimony, where evidence is received over an objection, and a motion is made to strike out that testimony, is the inquiry exhausted before or proceeded with until the judge has disposed of that motion?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Right at that point I desire to ask, was any motion at any time made by Mr. Rockwell to reopen the case on the matters that were brought out?

Mr. COCKRAN. That formal motion was never made.

Mr. O'FERRALL. It never was. I understand the motion spoken of by the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] was made, and I propose to answer the question frankly and candidly as best I can.

When the contestant undertook to introduce witnesses to prove these 28 marked ballots objection was made by the attorney for the contestee and the witnesses were advised by his attorney not to answer the question, and they refused to answer.

Mr. MAGNER. Some of them did.

Mr. O'FERRALL. They were the Democratic officers who refused to answer; but subsequently the Republican officers were put upon the stand and were interrogated, and they went on to state the character of these ballots. When the matter came before the committee counsel for the contestant gave notice that he would make a motion to expunge that testimony from the record.

Mr. COCKRAN. The contestee.

Mr. O'FERRALL. The counsel of the contestee made that motion. That matter was not decided by the committee. The committee have not passed upon it, for the reason that from the view the committee took of this case it was not necessary.

Mr. COCKRAN. That is right.

Mr. O'FERRALL. The committee did not think it necessary to pass upon it.

Mr. COCKRAN. Then the motion has not been passed upon?

Mr. O'FERRALL. No; and there are a great many other questions we did not want before the committee. But the question is now before the House, and it is perfectly competent for it to determine whether or not it will throw out these 16 marked ballots for one man and count the 28 marked ballots for another man.

Mr. MAGNER. It can in this case, under the law, throw out the one and count the other. I can take the record and show conclusively why they should throw out the 16 votes in the one case and count the 28 in the other. [Applause.]

Mr. BUSHNELL. I want to inquire of the gentleman at what period of time after the election it was discovered that there were 28 marked ballots cast for Mr. Rockwell?

Mr. MAGNER. I will tell the gentleman under the Revised Statutes applicable to this case forty days are allowed for the contestant to put in direct proof under his pleading; forty more days are then allowed the contestee to put in direct and rebuttal proof against the proof put in by the contestant; then ten days are allowed the contestant to put in rebuttal proof only, and on the last of the ten days, the very last day, when only rebuttal proof could properly be admitted, this contestant was allowed to put in proof of these 28 marked ballots.

Mr. BUSHNELL. What I want to get at is this: At what time does the proof show that it was discovered that those 28 ballots were marked?

Mr. O'FERRALL. The night of the election.

Mr. MAGNER. The canvassers in canvassing the ballots discovered that these were marked.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Were those 28 ballots preserved as sample ballots, or, under the law of the State of New York, was it the duty of the inspectors to destroy them?

Mr. MAGNER. It was their duty to destroy them. Only defective and sample ballots are kept under the law. These were destroyed.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Were these destroyed in point of fact?

Mr. MAGNER. I presume so.

Mr. HAUGEN. No; the proof is that they were carried off by Mr. Sheehan, an inspector of election.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. But under the law of New York they were required to be destroyed?

Mr. MAGNER. Yes, sir.

Mr. O'FERRALL. And a Democratic inspector carried them off in his pocket.

Mr. COCKRAN. The Republicans alone seem to have been virtuous.

Mr. BUTLER. Is it correct, as has been stated here, that the 16 ballots—

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House will be in order. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MAGNER] has expired.

Mr. MAGNER. I believe I have an hour, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's hour has expired.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York [Mr. MAGNER] be given more time, for he has shown such a disposition to answer questions and so many of us are ignorant of this subject that I think it will be wise for the House to give him the additional time. He has shown not only a disposition to answer but a capacity to answer which must be very satisfactory to all the members who are seeking for information about the case and the law which governs it.

A MEMBER. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. MAGNER. I can finish in half an hour.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York be allowed half an hour more time.

Mr. O'FERRALL. I suggest fifteen minutes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MAGNER. Why, the gentleman himself has taken fifteen minutes of my time. [Laughter.]

Mr. O'FERRALL. No doubt I have; but it has resulted from the gentleman's own remarks.

By unanimous consent, the time of Mr. MAGNER was extended for half an hour.

Mr. MAGNER. Now, Mr. Speaker, I shall refer to the 28 marked ballots that were cast for Col. Rockwell, and I think I shall redeem my promise to show that the 16 marked ballots for Noyes should not be counted, and, at the same time, that the 28 marked ballots for Rockwell should be counted and given credit for, although they are improperly and falsely in the record of this case. The law of the State of New York which we are discussing says:

No voter shall place any mark upon his ballot by means of which it can be identified as the one voted by him.

Now, let us take the record and see what these 28 ballots were. There were six witnesses examined as to those ballots. Two of them were the Democratic inspectors and, under the advice of counsel, they refused to disclose any information that they had upon the subject. The others who were examined were Republicans and friends of the contestant, Mr. Noyes. Now let us see what they say about these 28 ballots and see if they come under the provision of the law which describes fraudulent and void ballots. I shall quote from the record the testimony of each and all of these witnesses. I read first from page 24 of the record the testimony of Mr. Tubbs, a Republican inspector. He says:

Well, some of the ballots were marked with a check mark, a small check mark, in the left-hand corner and others in the upper right-hand corner with a small check mark.

Q. Any other marks upon them?

A. Yes, something like figures.

Now, I read from the testimony of Charles Tidd, another Republican inspector. He says:

There were two marks on each ballot, a check mark in one corner and something like a figure in the corner diagonally opposite.

Next I read the testimony of Horace Batterson, a Republican, a friend of Mr. Noyes. He says:

Well, there was a check mark in one corner on them and something that looked like the figure "8," and still it was curled up a little more, in the corner diagonally opposite.

Mr. TUCKER. Was he an inspector, too?

Mr. MAGNER. No, I believe he was a watcher. The other two were inspectors. I read now the testimony of W. J. Daniels, a watcher. He says:

These marks were the same that have been described here before, a check mark was in one corner and something like a figure in the corner diagonally across.

Mr. DUNPHY. On each ballot?

Mr. MAGNER. On each and every one of the twenty-eight. The testimony of each and singular of these six witnesses is to the effect that those ballots were marked with a check mark and that diagonally opposite was something like a figure, whether it was an "8" or not none of them positively say.

Mr. BUTLER. Does the gentleman say that this evidence came in at such a time that under the rules of procedure the contestee had no chance to answer it?

Mr. MAGNER. Yes, sir; it came in on the very last day allowed for the presentation of evidence in rebuttal, and the contestee had no chance to reply or to prove anything about this matter.

Mr. BUSHNELL. Was it ever known who did cast any of those 28 ballots?

Mr. MAGNER. No, sir; nobody can tell. These witnesses were asked, each and every one of them, whether they knew anything about these ballots or the intention of the voter in casting them. Let me refer to some of the testimony on this subject. Here, for instance, is the testimony of Tubbs:

Q. Did you know at the time the meaning of the marks upon them?

A. No, sir.

Q. Have you since learned anything about the marks upon them?

A. No.

Here is the evidence of the next witness, Tidd, on this point:

Q. Did you at the time know anything of the meaning of the marks upon these ballots?

A. No.

Q. And have you since learned anything?

A. I have not, positive.

The next witness is Batterson. Here is his testimony:

Q. Had you any knowledge of the meaning of these marks upon these ballots?

A. No, sir.

Q. Have you learned since?

A. No, sir.

The next witness is Daniels, whose testimony is as follows:

Q. Did you know at that time anything about the meaning of the marks upon the ballots?

A. No, sir.

Q. Have you learned since?

A. No, sir.

It will be seen that these witnesses, all Republicans and friends of Col. Noyes, testify to these facts—that these 28 ballots were each of them marked with a check mark on one corner and diagonally opposite a figure of some kind.

Mr. DE FOREST. The decision of the court of appeals, to which the gentleman has referred, is predicated, I believe, upon the statute—

Mr. MAGNER. I hope the gentleman will allow me to go on.

Mr. DE FOREST. Which has been enacted since the election.

Mr. MAGNER. Yes, sir.

Mr. DE FOREST. And the statute as amended contains the express provision that ballots which are marked shall be rejected?

Mr. MAGNER. I have gone over all that question and shown that the statute was amended and the rights of the canvassers curtailed.

I mean no discourtesy, but if the gentleman will permit me to continue the line of my present argument I will answer his question as soon as I can.

The testimony of these witnesses is that these ballots were marked in identically the same way; that these persons whose testimony was obtained were not aware at the time of the election of the meaning of those marks upon the ballots and had not acquired any knowledge of the meaning subsequently; that it was impossible from the character of the marks to distinguish one ballot from another, or to tell who cast one or another of those ballots, or the whole 28 of them.

Now, the prohibitive provision of this act as to marked ballots is:

No voter shall place any mark upon his ballot by means of which it can be identified as the one voted by him.

I ask the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. O'FERRALL] whether he can place his hand on one of these 28 ballots and say, as the law requires, that he can identify that ballot, or that any man on God's earth can identify any particular one of these ballots as the ballot cast by any individual voter on the 4th of November, 1890.

Mr. O'FERRALL. Why, the very decision which the gentleman stands upon was a decision in a case where every ballot was marked and the court ruled, as the gentleman says, that they must go out.

Mr. MAGNER. In that case the ballots were marked so that they were distinguishable.

Mr. O'FERRALL. They were marked exactly alike.

Mr. MAGNER. Each and every one was distinguishable.

Mr. O'FERRALL. How distinguishable?

Mr. MAGNER. I will show you how. The Republican ballots that were to be used in the Second district were marked "First district," and vice versa, so that it was possible for any person to determine who it was that voted a Republican ballot and who voted a Democratic ballot.

Mr. O'FERRALL. How could any man tell who voted a Republican ballot? Was the voter's name on it, or was there a number upon it?

Mr. MAGNER. It could be told by the indorsement that it was a Republican ballot that the man voted; and that was why the court of appeals ruled out those ballots.

Mr. O'FERRALL. But they were all marked alike.

Mr. MAGNER. Let me explain the matter. The Republican ballots and the Democratic ballots in each election district were numbered alike; that is, there were four sets of ballots—Socialistic-Labor, Prohibition, Democratic, and Republican.

The Republican ballots in the first election district had district number 2 indorsed on the outside so as to be seen by the election officer, when the ballot was folded and handed to him by the voter to be placed in the ballot box, and in the second election district the ballots had the indorsement marked district number 1. The Democratic and other official ballots were correctly indorsed, now when a Republican voter presented his folded ballot to the election officer, if he voted the Republican ballot the election officer would observe that it was improperly indorsed and would thereby know how he voted and if he did not vote a ballot with this wrong indorsement the officer would know that the voter did not vote a Republican ballot, and so also, in the second district, the officers there would see that the Republican ballot was marked for the first district, and so on.

Mr. O'FERRALL. Were not the Democratic ballots marked in the same way?

Mr. MAGNER. No, sir.

Mr. O'FERRALL. Most assuredly they were.

Mr. MAGNER. No, sir; they were not. The first district Democratic ballots had on them first district, while the first district Republican ballots had on them the second district, thus reversing the number, so that they could be readily distinguished. That is the point. These are the conditions that exist in the case at bar, and the rule of law enunciated by the court of appeals in interpreting this statute must be applied here.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think I have demonstrated from the testimony of these people that it is utterly impossible to identify any one of these 28 ballots, or for anyone to determine that any particular man voted any of them. Neither the provisions nor the spirit of the law was therefore violated when these ballots were voted giving them the worst possible aspect which the testimony in this record will permit. The Republican election officers who canvassed these votes admitted that neither at that time nor since were they able to determine who of the 28 persons had cast a single ballot. They can not be identified, and are therefore not objectionable under the provisions of this act, because the secrecy of the ballot has as far as they are concerned been still maintained—

Mr. TRACEY. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. MAGNER. Certainly.

Mr. TRACEY. Is there anything in evidence which will enable us to know who voted any of the Doyle ballots?

Mr. MAGNER. Yes, sir.

Mr. TRACEY. I would be glad if that was explained.

Mr. MAGNER. Duncan McArthur, the Republican worker and bribe-giver, according to the evidence marked all the ballots by his own hand and gave them to the electors, who afterwards voted them. Let us assume that he gave the ballot marked "A. Doyle" to John Smith: When that vote was canvassed and the ticket with the name of "A. Doyle" appeared to be counted in the result Duncan McArthur knew that John Smith had performed his share of the bargain. When the man who gave the Doyle ballot marked "B. Doyle" to Tom Jones discovered in the canvass that the "B. Doyle" ballot was turned out of the box to be counted he knew that Tom Jones had deposited the ballot with the officers of election, and that Tom Jones had worked out his share of the bargain, and was entitled to his price. Thus you see that the ballot was marked by the voter for identification and that it was subsequently identified as the one voted by him.

A MEMBER. Is it shown clearly that Duncan McArthur wrote all of these ballots?

Mr. MAGNER. Yes, sir; every one of them.

Mr. TRACEY. That is admitted.

Mr. MAGNER. Undoubtedly.

Mr. BUSHNELL. In his handwriting?

Mr. COBB of Alabama. That is not questioned.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. And each one of these could be identified separately?

Mr. MAGNER. Yes, sir; each one of them could be identified.

Now, Mr. Speaker, another point I will refer to, which seems to have a good deal annoyed and disturbed some of my Democratic colleagues from New York; I refer to the decision of the court of appeals in the case of The People ex rel. Noyes vs. Rockwell.

The controversy arises upon the conceded fact that there was before the board of county canvassers a certificate of the inspectors of election which contained one result of the vote for member of Congress in the body of the paper, and another and different result in the writing on the attached ballots. The board canvassed and estimated the vote for member of Congress in these districts according to the writing on the ballots, and not according to that contained in the body of the paper, and this method of canvassing and estimating the result gave Rockwell 481 votes and Noyes 466 votes, or Rockwell 23 votes more, and Noyes 22 votes less than the number announced at the close at the canvass by the inspectors, and inserted by them in the certificate. The question is whether the board of county canvassers in thus canvassing and certifying the vote performed the duty imposed upon them by the law. It was not their duty to ascertain which of the candidates was in fact elected, nor even which of them in fact received the greatest number of votes in the six districts, but simply to determine from the documentary evidence before them, furnished by the action of the inspectors, and upon which alone they could act, the number of votes given for each candidate respectively for Representative in Congress.

This document, from which the canvassers are required, in a ministerial capacity, to estimate and certify the vote, is called in the statute a statement, and this controversy arises from what appears to be an honest difference of opinion between the learned counsel who have presented the case as to the true scope and meaning of that word. On the one hand it is argued that when there is a conflict between the writing on the attached ballot and that inserted in the body of the paper the board in canvassing the vote is bound by the latter, while on the other hand it is insisted that the attached ballots and the writing thereon are a part of the statement, and it is within the power of the board to estimate and certify the true vote from them. The question thus becomes one purely of construction.

Now, in the determination of that case there were pleadings, as in this case, and the issues were raised by the pleadings. It was what is known as a mandamus proceeding, to compel certain specified canvassers of election to return certain certificates and returns made by them to the board of county canvassers. In the answer was denied the right of the court to so order, and solely and simply was this question determined. And when the court afterwards says:

If it be claimed that the actual result at the polls was different in fact from that shown by this statement, that question must be left for the determination of another tribunal—

they meant by this that the court of appeals of the State of New York had no jurisdiction, and never had, to determine contested-election cases. That court is not a court of original jurisdiction. It can not originally determine any controversy between any citizens. It must be brought there on appeal from the courts of original jurisdiction. It can only consider such facts as are presented in printed statements, and can not go outside thereof to inquire or determine. They knew and they meant by that that it could not be determined in this proceeding who was elected as member of Congress, Noyes or Rockwell, for that question was not before them, and they knew that they had no jurisdiction to determine it if it did not regularly come on an appeal from the proper tribunal.

If Mr. Rockwell had had an opportunity in the courts of the State of New York to test the merits of this case as they have been presented here by the record of the case before us, I have no doubt as to what would be the final judgment when that august body, the court of appeals, had been reached. I have no doubt that it would be the same as that which I have tried here to contend for in regard to the merits of this controversy, and that is in accordance with the adjudication they have already given upon this statute and upon the fundamental principle involved in it, which was brought out in the senatorial contested-election cases from which I have quoted. Even the Supreme Court could only dispose of this case when brought before them under proper proceedings.

Not in this mandamus proceeding could the supreme court determine the rights of the contestant and the contestee upon the merits of this contest. That would have to be undertaken in a different proceeding. This is merely a proceeding to mandamus certain ministerial officers, to perform a specific duty laid out for their performance by the statutes of the State. There is, however, a proceeding wherein this question could have been decided between these people in the courts of the State of New York. That proceeding is known as quo warranto, and that is the only manner in which it could have been decided. But that action could not be brought in this case, by Mr. Rockwell, for the reason that Mr. Rockwell had the certificate of election.

By the act of the State board of canvassers in awarding him a certificate of election he received the very best title that could be given him, and he must be satisfied with that muniment of title. He could not controvert that or dispute the validity of that muniment of title to the office. It was the highest title that could be had by any man seeking the office. He could not begin proceedings quo warranto, for he already had the title to the office. He could not raise the question in any way, because he had possession; and therefore in the courts of his State he was debarred from going into the merits of this controversy, and it was determined between them upon a side issue, the relevancy of which I do not concede here, which I have not touched upon.

But why did not the contestant here, who had the right to institute such proceedings and have this controversy determined on its merits because he had not the certificate, why did he not institute such an action? No, he preferred to come before this House upon a technical title, seize advantage of a side issue determined in his favor, and trust to befool the members and work upon their strained notions of justice and right.

We owe this contestant no favor here. This House is the sole judge of the qualifications of its members and their rights to seats on this floor. Under all the rules of law applicable to this case, the sitting member, Mr. Rockwell, should retain his seat, and such should be the judgement of this House if it deals fairly and justly between these parties.

Mr. HOAR. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report back adversely the bill (S. 387) to prohibit the allowing of attorney's fees in cases of foreclosures of mortgages in courts of the United States when it is forbidden by State laws in the courts of the State. The same is true of this bill; the provisions have been inserted in another bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. PADDOCK subsequently said: I ask that the vote by which Senate bill 387 was indefinitely postponed be reconsidered, and that the bill may be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee. I may wish to say something about it.

Mr. HOAR. I have no objection if the Senator desires that to be done, but I will state to him that the Judiciary Committee has recommended in the House bill which has been reported favorably and is pending in the Senate the insertion of a provision limiting attorneys' fees in all cases to those fixed in the Revised Statutes, which are in most instances only two or three dollars a case, and which do not exceed $20, I think, in any case whatever, cutting up by the roots the system of taxing large attorney's fees in mortgage sales and all those things.

Mr. PADDOCK. I am not sure that that will satisfy me, and I prefer to have the bill placed on the Calendar for personal reasons.

Mr. HOAR. Very well; the Senator can look at the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The vote indefinitely postponing the bill will be reconsidered, and it will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

Mr. HOAR. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report back adversely the bill (S. 2264) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish circuit courts of appeals, and to define and regulate in certain cases the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, and for other purposes." A similar bill has already passed the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. HOAR. I am also instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report back adversely the bill (S. 2353) in relation to the Court of Claims. The provisions of this bill have passed the Senate in another bill.

R. 7818) to provide for certain of the most urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1892, and for other purposes, to report it with amendments. I give notice that I shall call up the bill to-morrow morning after the routine business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. BUTLER. I beg leave to accompany the bill with a letter from Judge Simonton, the district judge of South Carolina, to which I beg to invite the attention of the Committee on the Judiciary, and ask if we can not have early action in regard to the bill. It seems to be a matter of some importance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill and accompanying paper will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2972) to refund to the corporate authorities of Frederick City, Md., the sum of $200,000 exacted of them by the Confederate army under General Jubal Early, in 1864, under penalty of burning said city; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 2978) granting an increase of pension to James T. Smith; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. GIBSON of Maryland submitted six amendments intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

SALE OF NONMINERAL LANDS.

Mr. POWER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish the Senate, and at as early a date as practicable, with a detailed statement of all moneys received by the General Land Office, and the cost of survey and sale of same for all nonmineral lands sold from the public domain during the past ten fiscal years, up to and ending June 30, 1891, within the areas now included in the States of California, Colorado, Idaho, Montana, Nevada, North Dakota, Oregon, South Dakota, Washington, and Wyoming, and the Territories of Arizona, New Mexico, Oklahoma, and Utah. This information to be arranged by fiscal years, under receipts and expenditures, by States and Territories and by land districts within the same.

SALMON FISHING IN ALASKA.

Mr. PLATT submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Fish Commissioners be, and he is hereby, directed to communicate to the Senate any information in his possession relative to salmon fishing in Alaska, its extent, and whether the methods employed in catching salmon are likely to diminish the supply and eventually exterminate the salmon, together with his opinion as to what measures should be adopted for the protection and preservation of the salmon industry in Alaskan waters.

DYNAMITE-GUN CRUISER VESUVIUS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there further morning business? If there be no further morning business, the first case on the Calendar under Rule VIII will be stated.

The bill (S. 1558) to remit the penalties on the dynamite-gun cruiser Vesuvius was announced as first in order, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to remit to the Pneumatic Dynamite Gun Company, of New York City the time penalties exacted by the Navy Department under the contract with that company for the construction of the dynamite-gun cruiser known as the Vesuvius, the United States having suffered no damage by the delay in the construction, and the cruiser having been accepted by the Department as satisfactory.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to hear some explanation of the bill.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The Committee on Naval Affairs made this report, and it is based largely upon the letter of the Secretary of the Navy, which I will ask to have read at the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, February 11, 1891.

SIR: Referring to the letter from the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate, under date of the 28th ultimo, inclosing a copy of S. 4559, "to remit the penalties on the dynamite-gun cruiser Vesuvius," and requesting my views upon the subject of the bill, I have the honor to state that the vessel has been completed and accepted, and while there were great delays in her completion, extending to a period of four hundred and thirty-four working days, the Government has sustained no damage by reason of such delay.

Very respectfully,

B. F. TRACY, Secretary of the Navy.

HON. J. D. CAMERON,

Chairman Committee on Naval Affairs, United States Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COURTS IN KANSAS.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7020) to create a third division of the district of Kansas for judicial purposes, and to fix the time for holding court therein. It is a local matter. The bill was read to the Senate the other morning and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] then objected to its consideration. He informs me that he is satisfied with the bill. It is a matter of some local importance to our people, and I ask for its consideration now.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has been heretofore read at length as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. VEST. When this bill was called up the other day I made no objection to its consideration, but I rose for the purpose of making a statement that I will make now. I do not propose that my action in not opposing the bill shall be considered as any indorsement of the present judicial system that prevails in the Indian Territory.

This bill simply transfers the place of holding court from Topeka, in the State of Kansas, to another point in that State which is more adjacent to the Indian Territory, but retains the jurisdiction over offenses committed in the Indian Territory in the court. I want to say, and I propose to make it effective whenever I can, that I am utterly opposed to the whole system of dragging Indians out of the Indian Territory in order to try them before courts in Texas, Arkansas, or Kansas. But the Senate has refused hitherto to apply the proper remedy to this system, and I do not oppose the pending bill simply because it is a question of expense. It puts the court nearer to the Indian Territory, but retains what I consider a most vicious system, to which I have alluded.

Mr. PERKINS. I wish to say simply that I agree with the Senator from Missouri that this jurisdiction ought to be exercised elsewhere, and I have for years contended that courts in the Indian Territory should be organized to do this work. Whenever the committee of which the Senator is a member will report such a bill I shall give to it my cordial indorsement and support. But, as suggested by him, this is not creating a new jurisdiction. This jurisdiction exists now in the courts of the United States, and under the provisions of the bill the court is taken nearer to the corner of the Indian Territory than at present, and the cost to the Government of the United States will be less and the convenience of the people and the Indians better accommodated. There is a public building at Fort Scott now, no expense is incurred in that particular, and the bill simply provides that a term of court shall be held there.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONSULS TO THE CONGO FREE STATE.

Mr. MORGAN. When I was absent from the Senate (and I have not been absent from this body twenty minutes except on public business) the bill (S. 2424) for the appointment of consuls to the Congo Free State was passed over informally. I ask that it be taken up.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations with an amendment in section 1, line 9, before the word "Point," to strike out the word "Bonona" and insert "Banana."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REAR-ADMIRAL JAMES E. JOUETT.

The bill (S. 204) in relation to the pay of Rear-Admiral James E. Jouett, retired, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that Rear-Admiral James E. Jouett, of the United States Navy, retired, shall be paid the highest pay and compensation of his grade as a rear-admiral.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN NICKLES.

The bill (S. 1415) for the relief of John Nickles was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It appropriates $1,016 to pay the claim of John Nickles for the purchase price paid by him to the United States for 400,000 feet of lumber, laths, and logs bought by him from the Government at Big Cottonwood Canyon, in the Territory of Utah, on the 28th of September, 1876, the title to which has failed; and the further sum of $236.80, being the amount paid out by Nickles as costs of court in litigating the title to the property with the adverse holders thereof, making a total sum of $1,252.80.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ST. CHARLES COLLEGE, MISSOURI.

The bill (S. 30) for the relief of St. Charles College was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments. The first amendment was, in line 10, after the word "occupation," to strike out the words "and to find, award;" so as to read:

That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to cause to be investigated by the Quartermaster's Department of the United States Army the circumstances, character, and extent of the alleged use and occupation by the United States military authorities for Government purposes, during the late war, of the college buildings and grounds of St. Charles College, in St. Charles County, Mo., the actual value of such use and occupation, and certify to the Secretary of the Treasury what amount, if any, is equitably due to said St. Charles College from the United States as the reasonable value of such use and occupation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 13, after the word "occupation," to strike out the remainder of the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that the vote may be first taken on striking out these words, following the word "occupation," in line 13:

And for damages to such buildings and grounds, the natural result of such use and occupation.

Let the vote be taken on that as a separate amendment first.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the committee striking out the words indicated by the Senator from Missouri.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope that the amendment striking out the remainder of the bill will not be agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEPPER] who reported the bill is not in his seat, but on consultation with him I find that that is an error, and the amendment should not be agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 15, after the words already stricken out, the committee report to strike out the following:

And that the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay to said St. Charles College, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the amount, if any, so found to be due from the United States; and the acceptance by said St. Charles College of any sum paid under the provisions of this act shall be in full satisfaction of all claims of every kind and nature for said use and occupation, and all damages resulting therefrom.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will state that it has been the practice heretofore of the Committee on Claims and of the Senate in these church cases to make an appropriation direct for such amount as the War Department may find to be due.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.
The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN G. ROSE.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I ask that Senate bill 1999, for the relief of John G. Rose, be now considered. It was reached on the Calendar and passed over without prejudice.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1999) for the relief of John G. Rose. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Navy to amend the records of the Navy Department so as to place the name of John G. Rose on the roll as an acting master's mate from the time of his second enlistment, February 10, 1865, to the time of his discharge, January 30, 1868, and to cause an honorable discharge to be delivered to Rose as an acting master's mate, to take the place of the discharge as seaman which he now holds. The proper accounting officer of the Treasury Department is to open and adjust the account of Rose as an officer in the United States Navy, and to allow and pay to him the difference between the pay of seaman and acting master's mate from February 10, 1865, to January 30, 1868.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COMMANDER DENNIS W. MULLAN.

The joint resolution (S. R. 57) authorizing Commander Dennis W. Mullan, United States Navy, to accept a medal presented to him by the Chilean Government, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MRS. ESTHER J. BOONE.

The bill (S. 1033) granting a pension to Mrs. Esther J. Boone was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 9, before the word "dollars," to strike out "twenty-four" and insert "twelve;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the name of Mrs. Esther J. Boone, of Lincoln, Nebr., who, by exposure and overexertion, lost her hearing while serving as a hospital nurse and sanitary agent from 1862 until the close of the war of the rebellion, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WILSON subsequently said: I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the bill (S. 1033) granting a pension to Esther J. Boone was passed may be reconsidered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa asks that the vote by which the bill (S. 1033) granting a pension to Esther J. Boone was ordered to a third reading and passed may be reconsidered. If there be no objection, it is so ordered, and the bill is before the Senate.

Mr. WILSON. I think there was a mistake made in the amendment to that bill. It provided for granting to this person $24 per month; an amendment has been made reducing that to $12. I ask that the report of the committee may be read. It certainly seems to me that the Senate will grant the amount provided for in the bill, for if there is a more meritorious case than this it has not come to my observation recently.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator desire the reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment of the committee was agreed to?

Mr. WILSON. Yes, I ask that that be reconsidered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered in the absence of objection. The question is on the amendment as proposed by the committee. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. PADDOCK March 19, 1892:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1033) granting a pension to Mrs. Esther J. Boone, have examined the same and report: The claim was rejected by the Bureau of Pensions on the ground that claimant was not in the service of the United States, but was a civilian employee and not entitled to a pension under existing laws.

The records of the War Department show that claimant was a nurse in the general hospital at Keokuk, Iowa, from June 13, 1862, to December 31, 1864. Under date of July 9, 1867, M. K. Taylor, surgeon, United States Army, retired, certifies that Mrs. E. J. Boone was regularly appointed a matron or nurse in the general hospital at Keokuk, Iowa, under the charge of affiant; that her length of service and the capacity in which she served can be ascertained by the pay rolls of the medical purveyor then stationed at St. Louis, who paid the civilian employees of the hospital.

In certificate filed August 2, 1887, J. D. Miller, late assistant surgeon of the Eleventh Regiment Iowa Volunteer Infantry, certifies that claimant was engaged as a hospital nurse from March 1, 1862, till the hospitals were broken up in 1865; that to the knowledge of the affiant the said claimant was actively engaged all the time in caring for the sick and wounded and forwarding supplies.

In affidavit filed August 2, 1887, H. T. Cleaver, late assistant surgeon United States Army, certifies that claimant served in the capacity of matron in the Estes House or Fifth Street Hospital, at Keokuk, Iowa, in the employ of the United States, from the spring of 1862 till the close of the said hospital in July, 1865, during which time affiant was acting assistant surgeon in charge of the hospital.

Pension is claimed on account of deafness contracted while employed as hospital nurse at Keokuk, Iowa, in the service of the United States during the war of the rebellion.

In affidavit filed January 18, 1889, Dr. W. F. Peck, of Davenport, Iowa, testifies that he is well acquainted with claimant, who was formerly a nurse in the Iowa Soldiers' Orphans' Home, at Davenport, Iowa, and that she was compelled to give up her position in said home on account of imperfect hearing caused by inflammation of the throat, contracted while a nurse in hospitals during the war of the rebellion.

In a certificate filed January 18, 1889, Dr. H. B. Lowry, president of the board of United States examining surgeons at Lincoln, Nebr., states that claimant is totally deaf in her left ear and almost totally deaf in her right ear; that she can not hear a watch in contact with either ear.

The evidence shows that claimant rendered valuable service to the Government as a hospital nurse during the war of the rebellion, and that she contracted deafness incident to said service. It is also shown that she is incapacitated for certain kinds of employment by reason of the said deafness.

The facts seem to warrant favorable action, and your committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. PADDOCK. Mr. President, I desire to say, in answer to what the Senator from Iowa suggested, that there was no mistake, no error made in fixing this amount. There was regret felt by the committee that this amendment had to be made. It was made for the reason that in another place, where there has also to be action had on these bills, a rule has obtained in times past that fixes the pension rate of army nurses, whatever the disability may be, at $12 per month. My own desire was that the amendment should not be made in the committee, and I was very anxious to report the bill at the full amount named therein, but for the reason stated it was considered by the committee to be better that the rule which has obtained should be followed.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska if the Senate has not already at a former session passed a bill fixing the amount of pension for army nurses at $12 per month, and whether all other bills of this character have not been made to conform to that rule?

Mr. PADDOCK. They have. That rule has obtained. I think a bill for a general law was passed through the Senate, but failed in the other House.

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly; it was passed here in the last Congress.

Mr. PADDOCK. I think this is one of the most meritorious cases ever presented to the Committee on Pensions since I have had the honor to serve upon that committee, but it does not stand alone of its class. There are some others of equal merit which have been laid aside, because it seemed necessary to do so in order to secure action.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think in every case that has passed this Congress $12 has been inserted. I have been watching these bills very closely, and if the Committee on Pensions has reported a greater amount than $12 it has escaped my observation. I do not think it has done that, and I hope the Senator from Iowa will not insist upon the amendment he has suggested.

Mr. WILSON. My judgment of the case is based upon the statement of facts in the report of the committee. Here this applicant has in effect lost her hearing, as the proof states. She can not even hear with either ear the tick of a watch: the hearing is entirely gone. The proof is positive as to the incurrence of the disability. It does seem to me that $12, in view of the many bills which have been passed at $20 and $25, is too small an amount for a case of this kind.

Mr. PADDOCK. If the Senator will allow me, I am compelled to say that he is in error as to a large number of cases having been passed at the rate of $20 and $25. I do not remember any such case in the past four years. I think one case of very great merit—perhaps it was in the Fifty-first Congress—was passed at $20.

Mr. WILSON. A number of cases have been passed as high as $25.

Mr. PADDOCK. I should be very glad myself to vote for the amendment of the Senator if such should be the sense of the Senate.

Mr. WILSON. I will move to amend the amendment by reducing the amount from "$24" to "$20."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Iowa to the amendment of the committee will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 9, it is proposed to strike out "$24" and insert "$20;" so as to read:

And pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month.

Mr. PLATT. I would just as soon vote for $24 a month as for $20. If we take it out of the rule $24 is not too much. It is simply a question of whether we are going to stand by the rule which has been adopted in all these cases, and while I should be very glad to vote for twenty or twenty-four dollars in this case, I feel compelled to stand by the rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment of the committee, which will be again stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 9, before the word "dollars," it is proposed to strike out "twenty-four" and insert "twelve;" so as to read:

And pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHARLES B. STIVERS.

Mr. COCKRELL. In the absence of the President pro tempore who is now in the chair, Senate bill 1588, Order of Business 389, was passed over without prejudice yesterday or the day before. I ask that it may be now considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill having been passed over without prejudice is in order.

The bill (S. 1588) for the relief of Charles B. Stivers was considered as in Committee of the Whole. By it the provisions of law, regulating appointments in the Army by promotions in the line are suspended for the purpose and only so far as they affect Charles B. Stivers; and the President of the United States is authorized, in the exercise of his discretion and judgment, to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint Charles B. Stivers, late a captain in the Seventh Infantry Regiment, to the same grade and rank of captain in the Army of the United States, in the infantry service, and to place him upon the retired list of the Army as of the date of December 30, 1864.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FORT DOUGLAS MILITARY RESERVATION.

The bill (S. 1602) granting a right of way on the Fort Douglas military reservation, in the Territory of Utah, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Salt Lake City Railroad Company, a corporation duly organized and existing under the laws of the Territory of Utah, and operating its electric lines upon the streets of Salt Lake City, its successors and assigns, are by the bill granted a right of way, not to exceed in width 50 feet, on the Fort Douglas military reservation, for a street railway, beginning at a point, to be approved by the Secretary of War, on the southwest line of the reservation, opposite Mount Olivet Cemetery, and running thence northeasterly over route to be approved by the Secretary to a point near the present military headquarters.

Mr. COCKRELL. In line 20, after the word "revocation," I move to insert "by the Secretary of War," so as to show clearly that the revocation is to be made by the Secretary of War.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC ENCAMPMENT.

The bill (S. 1819) authorizing the issuing and loaning of the ensigns, flags, signal numbers, etc., of the United States for the purpose of decorating the streets of the city of Washington on the occasion of the meeting of the encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic, in the month of September, 1892, was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. HAWLEY. Unless it is absolutely required that this bill shall be read through, I wish to offer as an amendment, in the nature of a substitute, a House joint resolution on the same subject, with an amendment or two.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is the joint resolution referred to by the Senator on the Calendar?

Mr. HAWLEY. It is not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut desire that the House joint resolution shall be taken up in lieu of the Senate bill?

Mr. HAWLEY. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to offer the House joint resolution as a substitute for this bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then the Senator should call that resolution up.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator should ask to take up the House resolution.

Mr. HAWLEY. In lieu of the Senate bill the House joint resolution, which I hold in my hand, has been referred to the Military Committee, and I am instructed to offer it as a substitute for this bill.

Mr. HARRIS. That would make it a Senate bill, which would have to go to the other House for concurrence. The Senator should report the joint resolution to the Senate from his committee, and ask that it be considered instead of the Senate bill.

Mr. HAWLEY. I will do that.

Mr. HARRIS. That is the better plan.

Mr. HAWLEY. Then I report from the Committee on Military Affairs the joint resolution (H. Res. 96) to authorize the loan of certain ensigns, flags, and signal numbers for the purpose of decorating the streets and buildings of Washington on the occasion of the Grand Army encampment in September, 1892, with certain amendments, and move that the Senate bill be laid aside, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut asks that the pending bill be laid aside temporarily, and that the Senate consider the joint resolution just reported by him from the Committee on Military Affairs. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. Res. 96) to authorize the loan of certain ensigns, flags, and signal numbers for the purpose of decorating the streets and buildings of Washington on the occasion of the Grand Army encampment in September, 1892.

Mr. HAWLEY. There are certain amendments reported by the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments reported by the Committee on Military Affairs will be stated.

The first amendment was, in section 1, line 4, after the word "be," to insert "and they are hereby;" in the same line, after the word "chairman," to strike out the word "on" and insert "of;" after the word "and," at the end of line 12, to insert "are;" and in line 16, before the word "shall," to insert "they;" so as to make the section read:

That the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy be, and they are hereby, authorized to loan to Louis D. Wine, chairman of the subcommittee in charge of street decorations, or his successor in said office, for the purpose of decorating the streets of the city of Washington, D. C., on the occasion of the encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic in the month of September, 1892, all of the United States ensigns, flags (except battle flags), signal numbers, etc., belonging to the Government of the United States, as in their judgment may be spared and are not in use by the Government at the time of the encampment. The loan of the said ensigns, flags, signal numbers, etc., to said chairman shall not take place prior to the 10th day of September, and they shall be returned by him by the 30th day of September, 1892.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, line 2, after the words "and so forth," to strike out "in the order and condition in which they were received;" and at the end of the section to add:

To secure just payment for any loss or damage to any of said ensigns, flags, and signal numbers not necessarily incident to the use specified.

So as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That for the protection and return of said ensigns, flags, signal numbers, etc., the said Louis D. Wine, or his successor in office, shall execute and deliver to the President of the United States, or to such officer as he may designate, a satisfactory bond in the sum of $50,000 to secure just payment for any loss or damage to any of said ensigns, flags, and signal numbers not necessarily incident to the use specified.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HAWLEY. Now, I move that the Senate insist on its amendments, and ask for a committee of conference with the House of Representatives thereon.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. DAVIS, Mr. PROCTOR, and Mr. PALMER were appointed.

Mr. HAWLEY. Let the Senate bill on the same subject be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senate bill 1819, on the same subject, will be indefinitely postponed.

INVESTIGATION OF CITY SLUMS.

Mr. KYLE. Order of Business 361, being a joint resolution providing for an investigation relative to the "slums of cities," was passed over without prejudice. I should be glad to call it up now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The title of the joint resolution will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. A joint resolution (S. R. 46) providing for an investigation relative to the slums of cities.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the joint resolution has been read at length, and there is an amendment pending by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY].

Mr. HAWLEY. I know that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] desires to speak upon this resolution. I do also. I should rather it were not taken up now. I ask that it be passed over without prejudice. I must be out of town for three or four days and I do not wish to speak now, but I wish to speak for perhaps ten, fifteen, or twenty minutes on the matter hereafter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut objects to the present consideration of the joint resolution. Being objected to, it will be passed over.

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not do this for any factious reason, but I want to speak on the joint resolution.

Mr. KYLE. I give notice that I shall call it up at some time when it will be convenient for the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am obliged to be absent until next Tuesday evening. I shall be ready at any time after that.

Mr. KYLE. Since the consideration of the joint resolution heretofore I have received a communication from the Commissioner of Labor, in which the matters are explained in reference to it, and I think it will all be satisfactory.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

JESSE W. FINCH.

The bill (S. 1138) to confirm title to 80 acres of land in the State of Washington to Jesse W. Finch and his grantees was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ALLEN. There are amendments reported by the Committee on Public Lands to the preamble.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments to the preamble will be stated.

The amendments were, in line 3 of the second clause of the preamble, after the word "sixteen," to insert "north;" and in the same line, after the word "range," to strike out "four" and insert "forty-three;" so as to read:

Whereas on the 5th day of December, A. D. 1878, the east half of the southeast quarter of section 4, in township 16 north, of range 43 east, of the Willamette meridian, containing 80 acres, in the State of Washington, was located under and with said certificate, in the name of Jesse W. Finch, the local land officers accepting the same as legal and valid, etc.

The amendments were agreed to.

The preamble as amended was agreed to.

FREDERICK GRAMM.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2332) for the relief of Frederick Gramm. It is a direction to the Secretary of War to so amend and correct the military record of Frederick Gramm, late a private soldier in Company B of the Fifty-sixth Regiment Ohio Volunteers, as to remove the charges of desertion, and to show that Gramm was captured by the enemy on June 25, 1862, and paroled on June 28, 1862, and permitted by Maj. Gen. Grant, commanding the district, to pass from Memphis, Tenn., to his home in Ohio, to remain until notified of his exchange or otherwise ordered and duly exchanged by General Orders No. 10, War Department, January 10, 1863, and ordered to return to his command, and absent without leave until March 5, 1863, when he enlisted in the Navy of the United States for two years, served faithfully, and was honorably discharged at the expiration of his service.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ERNEST ULRICH.

The bill (S. 2374) for the relief of Ernest Ulrich was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Secretary of War to correct and complete the record of Ernest Ulrich, late a member of Company G, First Missouri Engineers, so as to show him discharged on or about October 20, 1862, by reason of having furnished his son, Christian Ulrich, as a substitute, who, under the name of his father, completed the term, veteranized, and was honorably discharged on July 22, 1865, and to issue to Ernest Ulrich a certificate of such discharge of the date of October 20, 1862.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PAYMASTER JAMES E. TOLFREE.

The bill (S. 2224) for the relief of Paymaster James E. Tolfree, United States Navy, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is a direction to the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to James E. Tolfree, paymaster, United States Navy, the sum of $4,000, in full for all losses of both Government and personal property incurred by him by reason of the destruction by fire of the Windsor House, at Yokohama, Japan, on the morning of February 8, 1886.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PURCHASE OF SUPPLIES.

The bill (S. 550) to amend section 3709 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to purchase of and contract for supplies, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to amend section 3709 of the Revised Statutes of the United States by inserting after the word "services," in the first line thereof, the words "in excess of $200;" so that the section as amended shall read:

SEC. 3709. All purchases and contracts for supplies or services in excess of $200 in the War or Navy Department of the Government, except for personal services, shall be made by advertising a sufficient time previously for proposals respecting the same, when the public exigencies do not require the immediate delivery of the articles or performance of service. When immediate delivery or performance is required by the public exigency the articles or service required may be procured by open purchase or contract at the places and in the manner in which such articles are usually bought and sold or such services engaged between individuals.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RIGHT OF WAY ACROSS FORT DOUGLAS MILITARY RESERVATION.

The bill (S. 1605) granting a right of way through certain lands of the United States in the Territory of Utah, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It purpose to grant a right of way, not to exceed 50 feet in width, to the Popperton Place and Fort Douglas Rapid Transit Company, a railroad corporation duly organized and now existing under the laws of the Territory of Utah, across the Fort Douglas military reservation, for a street railway, the railway to enter upon the reservation from Logan avenue, Popperton Place, Salt Lake City. The location and width of the right of way shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of War, and the privileges thus granted shall be subject to revocation or such changes as may be required by him, and such changes shall be made at the expense of the railway company, and no stables shall be erected on the reservation, and no part of this land or right of way shall be used for storage of cars.

Mr. COCKRELL. I suggest in line 12, after the word "revocation," the insertion of the words "by the Secretary of War."

Mr. HAWLEY. I have not a copy of the bill before me. I do not understand how that is omitted.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is an oversight, I presume, in preparing the bill. It should read: "shall be subject to revocation by the Secretary of War or such changes as may be required by him." I move to insert the words "by the Secretary of War," so as to show clearly that the revocation is to be the Secretary of War and not by Congress.

Mr. HAWLEY. "Revocation by him" must refer to the Secretary of War, and nobody else.

Mr. COCKRELL. It might or might not, according to the construction.

Mr. HAWLEY. I have no objection to the amendment for the sake of greater certainty.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CLAIM OF GEORGE T. AND GUY P. VANCE.

The next business on the Calendar was the following resolution, reported by Mr. WHITE from the Committee on Claims, March 10, 1892:

Resolved, That the claim of George T. Vance and Guy P. Vance, executors of the estate of William L. Vance, deceased, late of Memphis, Tenn., represented by Senate bill numbered 40, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims, with all the papers in the case, under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1883, commonly known as the "Bowman act," as amended by the act of March 3, 1887, commonly known as the "Tucker act," to find the facts for the information of Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PADDOCK in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

THREATENED SIOUX INVASION OF NEBRASKA IN 1890 AND 1891.

The bill (S. 2476) to reimburse the State of Nebraska the expenses incurred by that State in repelling a threatened invasion and raid by the Sioux in 1890 and 1891, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments.

The first amendment was in line 3, after the words "Secretary of" to strike out "War be, and he," and insert "the Treasury;" in line 4, before the word "directed," to strike out "authorized and;" in the same line, after the word "directed," to strike out "to settle" and insert "through the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, to audit and pay;" in line 6, after the words "incurred by," to insert "and for;" after the word "State," at the end of line 11, to strike out "to the Secretary of a full, accurate, and detailed statement or estimate," and insert "of statements;" in line 14, after the word "said," to strike out "national guard," and insert "State for said purpose;" in line 16, after the words "sum of," to strike out "fifty" and insert "forty-two;" and at the end of the bill to insert:

Provided, That the pay and allowances to the officers and enlisted men of said national guard shall not exceed the pay and allowances of the Army of the United States.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed, through the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, to audit and pay the actual and necessary expenses incurred by and for the national guard of the State of Nebraska, called into the service of that State by Governor Thayer in the year 1890 and 1891, to repel a threatened invasion and raid, then imminent, by the Sioux, on presentation by the Governor or other proper authorities of said State of statements of the actual and necessary expenses incurred by said State for said purpose, accompanied, so far as possible, with the proper vouchers and satisfactory proof of the correctness thereof; and that the sum of $42,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to carry out the provisions of this act: Provided, That the pay and allowances to the officers and enlisted men of said national guard shall not exceed the pay and allowances of the Army of the United States.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. MANDERSON. Abundant reasons for the passage of this bill appear in the report, which is made by the Committee on Military Affairs. It is not along report. I will ask that it be printed in the RECORD, and I desire to supplement it with some material received since the report was made, in the nature of letters written at the time of the Sioux war by Gen. Miles, who was commanding the United States troops in that conflict, and from Hon. James E. Boyd, governor of Nebraska. I ask that these letters be attached to the report, and be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That order will be made in the absence of objection.

The report made by Mr. MANDERSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, March 10, 1892, is as follows:

The committee report in favor of the passage of this bill, with certain amendments indicated in the following print of the bill as proposed to be passed:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed, through the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, to audit and pay the actual and necessary expenses incurred by and for the National Guard of the State of Nebraska, called into the service of that State by Governor Thayer in the years 1890 and 1891, to repel a threatened invasion and raid then imminent by the Sioux, on presentation by the Governor or other proper authorities of said State of statements of the actual and necessary expenses incurred by said State for said purpose, accompanied, so far as possible, with the proper vouchers and satisfactory proof of the correctness thereof; and that the sum of $42,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, or so much thereof as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act: Provided, That the pay and allowances to the officers and enlisted men of said National Guard shall not exceed the pay and allowances of the Army of the United States.

The Sioux Reservation, with its 18,000 square miles, occupied by about 22,000 Sioux Indians, is located in great part in South Dakota, along the northern border of Nebraska, and in part in the last-named State. Brave and warlike, and retaining much of their original savagery, they are a foe to be feared, and their outbreak or threat of war causes dreadful anticipation among all settlers in their vicinity. The events of the winter of 1890-91 are too notorious and of too recent a date to need more than the faintest reference to them. Trouble threatened during all of the summer and fall of 1890, and in November was so imminent and a threat of such magnitude that, with Gen. Miles in command, a large body of United States troops was placed within striking distance of the hostile Indians.

The whole border was greatly alarmed and many settlers fled from their farms, taking refuge in the towns in Northwestern Nebraska. Indeed such action was recommended by the officers of the Government, and the War Department distributed arms among the frontiersmen for their better protection. The latter part of December, 1890, after the battle of Wounded Knee and the retreat of about 4,000 hostile Indians to the Bad Lands along White River, about 15 miles from the Nebraska line, a general Indian war involving all the tribes of the powerful Sioux Nation seemed unavoidable and danger to life and property was great. On January 2, 1891, the governor of Nebraska ordered the First Brigade of the Nebraska National Guard to the frontier to cooperate with the United States troops under Gen. Miles. The First and Second Regiments responded promptly, and under the command of Gen. L. W. Colby took positions as indicated in the following plan:

These troops were moved by rail from different parts of the State, and Company A, light artillery, and Troop A, of cavalry, were placed and held in readiness to move. The headquarters of the brigade were established at Rushville, Nebr., and the danger was threatening for a distance of 150 miles east and west and for 30 miles north and south. Hundreds of settlers had fled from their homes, leaving their stock and property uncared for. At Chadron alone there were 130 families of settlers gathered in from the neighborhood, dependent upon the public for shelter and food, and much the same condition obtained in all the frontier towns. Gen. Colby established a line of fortified posts or camps north of the line of towns on the Elkhorn Valley Railroad, with a reserve force at each important town.

The appearance of the State troops gave encouragement and confidence to the people, and the National Guard was a valuable adjunct to the troops of the Government stationed on the Indian reservation. General Miles approved of the disposition of the State troops. Many of the settlers returned to their homes. Strict military discipline was maintained in all the camps, and the National Guard of Nebraska won additional credit by prompt, cheerful, and able performance of their duties. On January 12, 1891, Gen. Miles communicated with Gen. Colby that the Indians showed every disposition to comply with the orders of the authorities. He said:

"I feel that the State troops can now be withdrawn with safety, and desire, through you, to express to them my thanks for the confidence they have given your people in their isolated homes."

On January 13, Gen. Victor Vifquain, adjutant-general of Nebraska, wired Gen. Colby:

"Your command will remain at the front until the lives and property of citizens are perfectly secured. Be more vigilant than ever; advise me daily. You will withdraw your command when everything is safe, not before."

On January 14, with the approval of Gen. Miles, Gen. Colby moved the troops to their homes. The campaign was made in the depth of winter in a country affording the severest of weather, and officers and soldiers vied with each other in the performance of their duty.

The following letter, lately received from the adjutant-general of Nebraska, is self-explanatory:

"STATE OF NEBRASKA, OFFICE OF ADJUTANT-GENERAL,
Lincoln, March 5, 1892.

"DEAR SENATOR: I mail you this day the report of the Indian campaign of 1890-91, as submitted to the Legislature, duly certified to by the governor. The Legislature loaned the money, so to speak, until the Federal Government should refund the same. I call your attention to pages 17 and 19 for dispatches of Gen. Miles, especially page 17, the last sentence of which commences: 'I feel that the State troops can now be withdrawn with safety,' etc. This shows that the State troops were needed; that they did not go to picnic in midwinter. The truth is that the position occupied by the Nebraska National Guards cut off the last chance for the escape of the Indians west of the Black Hills."

"The Legislature appropriated $37,200; I asked for $40,000. They thought they knew better than I did and they were mistaken; it will certainly take $42,000 to settle everything."

"I do not think that you wish to be burdened with one thousand different vouchers. The appropriation clause can read: '$42,000, or as much thereof as necessary, to be at the disposal of the Secretary of War to be paid to the State after the vouchers have been submitted to that official,' or words to that effect. We will then take steps to present the vouchers, which I am now compiling for that purpose. Do you not think this the best way?"

"I am, Senator, yours, respectfully,

"VICTOR VIFQUAIN, Adjutant-General."

"SENATOR CHARLES F. MANDERSON, Washington, D. C."

The letters ordered to be printed are as follows:

STATE OF NEBRASKA, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Lincoln, March 14, 1892.

MY DEAR SENATOR: When in the month of January, 1891, I became the chief executive of Nebraska, the whole of the State militia, with the exception of a company of infantry and a troop of cavalry, was mobilized in the northwestern part of the State, and had been there several days, for the purpose of protecting the lives and the property of the citizens of this State from the attacks of the hostile Sioux Indians, then in insurrection at the Pine Ridge Agency, a portion of which is located within the confines of this State.

On settlers, the nearest to the reservation, had already been driven from their homes; the rural population had in fact gathered in the towns along the line of railway, and danger was so imminent that United States forces were gathered at the reservation.

It is a matter of history how this trouble was settled, and the report of L. W. Colby, commanding First Brigade Nebraska National Guard, will enable you to see that the services of the Nebraska National Guard were appreciated by Gen. Miles, commandant of the combined Federal and State forces. I received many calls for assistance from the people, but had assurance from the general in command of the Nebraska National Guard that he was in position to protect the lives and property of the citizens. The position he occupied with his command proved of great advantage to the commander of the United States forces, inasmuch as it virtually prevented the retreat or escape of the hostiles.

If there ever was an emergency in the history of Nebraska, whether as a Territory or State, wherein the militia was needed for the protection of the people, I certify that the emergency which caused Governor John M. Thayer to call out the militia the latter part of 1890 was the one; for the reason that if the Nebraska National Guard had not been stationed where they were the Indians would have broken out and devastated the northwestern portion of our State in spite of the United States forces. This is a well-established fact.

I trust, Senator, that you will be enabled to procure such an appropriation as will reimburse the State for the necessary expenses it incurred in protecting our citizens against invasion.

I am, Senator, yours, respectfully,

JAMES E. BOYD, Governor.

HON. CHARLES F. MANDERSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

HEADQUARTERS DIVISION OF MISSOURI,
Pine Ridge, S. Dak., January 4, 1891.
GOVERNOR OF NEBRASKA,
Lincoln, Nebr.:

I understand that there are some State troops along the line of the railway, prepared to render service if required. They would be most effective deployed along the line of settlements near the northern boundary of Dawes and Sheridan Counties, in small detachments of six or eight men, at the ranches and isolated homes, to give confidence and security. A few men at such places can protect property and lives of the citizens, and contend against any number of Indians that might attempt to raid the settlements. There are always enough men in the towns to protect them. If necessary I can furnish ammunition, but not arms.

MILES, Major-General, Commanding.

HEADQUARTERS DIVISION OF MISSOURI,
Pine Ridge, S. Dak., January 2, 1891.

GOVERNOR OF NEBRASKA,
Lincoln, Nebr.:

Capt. Ruhlen's (quartermaster) telegram is received, regarding protection to settlements in Davis and Sheridan Counties. The hostile camp is near White Clay Creek, tributary of White River, and troops are now between the settlements and the hostiles. It would give confidence and protection to those settlements to put the companies of State troops along the settlements near the reservation, and it might also be well to furnish these settlements with arms, which would aid them in protecting their homes.

MILES, Major-General, Commanding.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FORT MISSOULA MILITARY RESERVATION.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, after line 22, to strike out:

And the agreement of the Secretary of War heretofore made under which the railroad now controlled and operated by the Northern Pacific and Montana Railroad Company was constructed and is now operated and maintained across said military reservation is hereby in all things ratified and confirmed.

And insert in lieu thereof:

The granting of the right of way hereinbefore recited is conditioned as follows: If at any time it may be deemed expedient by the Secretary of War that this authority be revoked he may cause notice to that effect to be given to the Northern Pacific and Montana Railroad Company, whereupon the right and privileges herein granted shall cease and determine, and the said railroad company shall, without delay, at its own cost, take up its tracks and remove the same and all other railroad material from the said reservation without damage to the soil, leaving the same in as good order and condition as at the granting of this authority.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 38, after the word "two," to strike out "lights" and insert "small light-ships;" and in line 41, after the word "exceeding," to insert "one thousand;" so as to make the clause read:

XXIII—218

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5499) to amend an act entitled "An act approving with amendments the funding act of Arizona," approved June 25, 1890, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. WASHINGTON, Mr. KILGORE, and Mr. PERKINS, managers at the conference on the part of the House.

BOSTON HARBOR IMPROVEMENT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the Senate of the 18th instant, a letter from the Chief of Engineers, dated the 19th instant, together with a copy of a letter from Lieut. Col. S. M. Mansfield, Corps of Engineers, relative to the cost of deepening the main channel of Boston Harbor; which was read.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Commerce to examine that report and see whether the map which accompanies it should be printed or not, as well as the letter; and, if so, that he will make the proper motion.

Mr. HARRIS. Had it not better be referred to the Committee on Commerce? Then the committee can order any printing they desire.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to have the matter advanced. It relates to an important improvement in Boston Harbor, which I want to have the committee consider in time for the river and harbor bill.

Mr. FRYE. I think that ordering the printing of the map will cause such delays that it will probably be useless at this session of Congress, and perhaps it had better not be printed, but let the communication be printed and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HOAR. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication and accompanying papers, except the map, will be printed and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

MILITARY POST NEAR HELENA, MONT.

Mr. HAWLEY. I dislike to ask the Senate to take up a bill out of its order, but I am going out of town for four or five days, and I am pressed by the Secretary of War, the Senators from Montana, and various citizens to ask for the early consideration of Senate bill 1881, to establish a military post near the city of Helena, in Lewis and Clarke County, in the State of Montana. I ask unanimous consent that it may be considered now.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1881) to establish a military post near the city of Helena, in Lewis and Clarke County, in the State of Montana.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, with an amendment in section 2, line 3, after the word "quarters," to insert "hospital;" so as to read:

SEC. 2. That for the purpose of defraying the expenses of locating the said army post as aforesaid, and of constructing barracks, quarters, hospital kitchens, mess halls, stables, storehouses, magazines, defenses, and other necessary and suitable improvements and buildings, there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $300,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, the same to be drawn from the Treasury and applied to said purposes under the direction of the Secretary of War.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAWLEY. This is a bill of so much importance and asking for so much money that I ought perhaps to put on record a brief statement about it.

This is a matter which has been long considered by the War Department. The establishment of this post is recommended by the Secretary of War, by the General commanding the Army, the general commanding the Department of the Missouri, and the general commanding the Department of Dakota. It is a part of a general system for rearranging the posts of the Army, which has become a wise and necessary policy.

We have no longer what is called technically "a frontier." The abolishment of small posts and the concentration of troops at points strategically strong and conveniently situated for quick distribution in case of necessity is a policy which is being carried out by the War Department. Pursuant to this policy, Fort Shaw, Fort Logan, Fort Ellis, and Fort Maginnis, in Montana, have all been discontinued, while other small posts and camps where military forces have been stationed in former time have disappeared. This affords the Government the opportunity to acquire 1,000 acres of land free of cost for the purposes of the act.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. CALL. Here is a very large appropriation for the establishment of a military post. We passed a bill a few days ago establishing a post in the State of Florida, for the erection of entirely new barracks, and the appropriation, I think, was $20,000. The $300,000 here proposed to be appropriated, especially in the present condition of the Treasury of the country, seems to me to be a large amount.

Mr. HAWLEY. Well, Mr. President, the Senator is correct; it is a large amount; but it is a matter, as I say—I can only repeat what I have already said—that the Secretary of War, the General commanding the Army, and the generals of various departments recommend. It causes the discontinuance of four very considerable forts and a number of small posts.

Mr. McPHERSON. Where is it located?

Mr. HAWLEY. In Helena, Mont. The Senators from Montana understand the question fully. I think the bill is wise and economical. I think it is most decidedly an economical measure.

Mr. SANDERS. Mr. President, the establishment of this post in that vicinity has been approved by various generals commanding the Army from the days of Gen. Grant down until now. It was the judgment of Gen. Sheridan, as it is now of all the army officers familiar with that region, that it is in the interest of the economy.

In response to what the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] is pleased to say, I will state that the bill itself contemplates as a condition precedent a very considerable contribution from the people in that region. A thousand acres of land at any place where it is likely this post will be established in that vicinity will not be likely to be worth less than from fifty to one hundred dollars an acre; and while I do not very cordially or enthusiastically support that portion of the proposition, I am satisfied that it will be accepted and the conditions be complied with.

There are a number of small posts remote from railroads which have been or are to be abolished there. The point selected in this bill is one from which railroads diverge at almost every point of the compass. It is near to our northern frontier, and troops can be maintained at the post to be established here much more cheaply than they can at the various posts to be abolished and those which have heretofore been abolished.

While it is true that the appropriation is somewhat large, I do not know, and I do not suppose indeed that it will be possible, that it will all be expended this year; but the creation of such a post as will accommodate the army which must live somewhere at that point will be accompanied with some expense. That expense, however, will be largely reimbursed by the saving which will result to the Government by removing the troops from posts which are now very expensive. Gen. Merritt, I believe, states that Fort Custer, which is one of the posts contemplated to be abandoned, is the most expensive post in the United States to supply, and inasmuch as at that point the necessity for a military force has ceased to exist, it is contemplated that it shall be abolished and that the troops shall be stationed at this new post.

There is no apprehension that the property will not be worth twice as much as the Government proposes to appropriate by this bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ECKINGTON AND SOLDIERS' HOME RAILROAD COMPANY.

The bill (H. R. 410) to amend the charter of the Eckington and Soldiers' Home Railroad Company was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with amendments. The first amendment was, in section 1, line 8, after the word "avenue," to strike out:

Thence southeasterly along New Jersey avenue to C street northwest; thence east along C street to North Capitol street, and thence south along North Capitol street to B street north, and also beginning at the intersection of G street and New Jersey avenue, east to Massachusetts avenue; thence southeasterly along Massachusetts avenue to North Capitol street, and—

And insert in lieu thereof:

and First street; thence south along First street NW. to C street NW.; then east along C street to New Jersey avenue; thence south along New Jersey avenue to a point in the center of said avenue at a distance of not less than 150 feet from the north curb line of B street north. Returning north along New Jersey avenue to D street; thence west on D street to First street NW.; thence north on First street to G street, and along G street to Fifth street NW.; also, beginning at the intersection of G street and New Jersey avenue; thence across New Jersey avenue to and along G street to North Capitol street.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, after line 27, to insert:

Also beginning at the intersection of New Jersey avenue and C street NW.; thence east on C street to Stanton square; thence around Stanton square, on the south side thereof, to C street NE. and along C street to Fifteenth street NE.; thence north on Fifteenth street to D street NE.; thence west on D street to Fourth street; thence south on Fourth street to and along C street to New Jersey avenue and the point of beginning. Provided, That until C and D streets shall be paved and provided with sewers to Fifteenth street the company shall not be required to construct its road beyond Twelfth street, and shall have authority to make connection with D street through Twelfth street.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 54, after the word "its," to strike out "line" and insert "lines;" so as to read:

Said company shall charge not exceeding 5 cents fare for one continuous ride from any point on its lines to the terminus of its main line or any of its branches.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, to insert at the end of section 1 the following additional provisos:

Provided, That the construction of said railroad on any street where there are or may be any mains, fixtures, or apparatus pertaining to the Washington Aqueduct shall be subject to such conditions as may be approved by the Secretary of War, which conditions must be obtained and be accepted in writing by said company before commencing any work on such street, and no steam cars, locomotives, or passenger or other cars for steam railroads shall ever be run on the tracks of said company over any such main, fixture, or apparatus. The said railroad shall be subject to the requirements of section 15 of the act of Congress approved February 28, 1891, entitled "An act to incorporate the Washington and Arlington Railway Company of the District of Columbia." The said company shall, before commencing work on said railroad on such street, deposit with the Treasurer of the United States to the credit of the Washington Aqueduct such sum as the Secretary of War may consider necessary to defray all the expenses that may be incurred by the United States in connection with the inspection of the work of construction of said railroad on such street, and in making good any damages done by said company or its works, or by any of its contracting agents, to any of said mains, fixtures, or apparatus, and in completing, as the Secretary of War may deem necessary, any of the work that the said company may neglect or refuse to complete; and that the Secretary of War may consider necessary for the safety of said mains, fixtures, or apparatus, and the said company shall also deposit as aforesaid such further sums for said purposes at such times as the Secretary of War may consider necessary: Provided, That the said sum shall be disbursed like other moneys appropriated for the Washington Aqueduct, and that whatever shall remain of said deposits at the end of one year after the completion of said railroad in such street shall be returned to said company on the order of the Secretary of War, with an account of its disbursement in detail: And provided also, That disbursements of said deposits shall, except in case of emergency, be made only on the order of the Secretary of War. The exercise of the rights by this act granted are to terminate at the pleasure of the Secretary of War in case of persistent neglect by said company, or by its successors, to make the deposits, or to comply with any of the conditions, requirements, and regulations aforesaid.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McMILLAN. I am instructed by the Committee on the District of Columbia to offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported.

The SECRETARY. In section 1, line 39, after the word "street," it is proposed to insert:

Also beginning at the present terminus of the Eckington and Soldiers' Home road on Fourth street extended, thence along and wholly outside of the present Bunker Hill road, on land to be acquired by said company by gift or purchase and made a part of said road, to a point to be located by the commissioners of the District of Columbia, west of Brooks Station: Provided, That nothing contained in this act shall be taken to require the extension provided for in this clause before said road shall have been widened as herein provided for: Provided further, That the tracks of said company on Lincoln avenue shall be taken up within thirty days from the passage of this act, and the roadway shall be restored to public uses in such manner as the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall direct.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McMILLAN. In line 84, on page 4, in section 1, I move to strike out "sum" and insert "sums."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McMILLAN. In section 1, line 89, before the word "disbursements," I move to strike out "its" and insert "their;" so as to read: "with an account of their disbursement in detail."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McMILLAN. In section 3, line 3, after the word "act," I move to insert "except as otherwise expressly provided for."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I should be very glad if the Senator from Michigan in charge of this bill would explain the necessity for it.

Mr. McMILLAN. The object of the bill is to enable the Eckington road, which now runs to the Soldiers' Home and the Catholic University, to extend its lines, which now run on G street, up to the Baltimore and Ohio depot first, using the tracks of the present companies, so that it is not necessary for them to build a track except on one block. Between Fourth and Fifth streets, on G street, they will have to build to connect the two lines. Then they use the tracks of the Belt Line until they get up to New Jersey avenue, when they use the tracks of the Metropolitan line.

Then it was thought best, instead of permitting new charters to be granted for the purpose of building new lines on the northeast side of the city, to extend this road up to Fifteenth street northeast. That enables passengers in the northeast part of the city to take the Eckington cars, which will take them either down to the Treasury Department in the center of the city with transfers to Georgetown, or will take them to the Soldiers' Home for the sum of 5 cents. If we were to allow charters to be given to those who are demanding them in the east end, it would simply mean that a passenger would have to pay 10 cents to take the same ride. This bill has had careful attention from the committee; it was examined very carefully, and we think it is a very good bill indeed, satisfactory to the citizens and advantageous for the District in every way. It has behind it petitions from hundreds of people.

Mr. MORGAN. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee whether this proposed railway line passes along G street between Fourth and Fifth?

Mr. McMILLAN. It now runs on G street.

Mr. MORGAN. It runs to Fifth street on G?

Mr. McMILLAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORGAN. Is it proposed to extend it from Fifth to Fourth on G?

Mr. McMILLAN. Yes; to fill up that gap, and then connect with what is called the Belt Line.

Mr. MORGAN. You can not put two lines of railway in that street without ruining it.

Mr. McMILLAN. They do not. There is no track there at all now.

Mr. MORGAN. I mean that you can not put a double track there without ruining that street.

Mr. McMILLAN. There is a double track on G street.

Mr. MORGAN. Up to Fifth there is, but not beyond that, not between Fourth and Fifth.

Mr. McMILLAN. The Senator will remember that on G street at that point the Pension Office is situated.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, I know, and that is the reason why you can not get a proper width of street there to put in two tracks.

Mr. McMILLAN. I do not think there is any difficulty about it. I have driven down there myself and looked at it very carefully.

Mr. MORGAN. I lived on that street for four years, and I know it to be the fact.

Mr. HARRIS. The street from Fourth to Fifth is as wide as it is from Fifth to Fifteenth.

Mr. MORGAN. No, not as wide.

Mr. HARRIS. It is quite as wide; and on one side there are no buildings. On the north side there are buildings.

Mr. MORGAN. On the south side there is the Pension Office.

Mr. HARRIS. Of course, and there is an open space.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan has the floor.

Mr. McMILLAN. The majority of the people who live there have no objection to this road. The track is laid very smoothly; the new pattern of rail is used, and when it is asphalted over there will not be any difficulty about it, and it will be a very great convenience to have this road extended that one block.

Mr. MORGAN. What is the motive power?

Mr. McMILLAN. Electricity.

Mr. MORGAN. Overhead?

Mr. McMILLAN. Underground or the storage battery. It is expressly provided in the bill that nothing else shall be used. It must be either underground or the storage-battery system.

Mr. VEST. They may use the present power that they have.

Mr. McMILLAN. That is storage. They use on New York avenue now the trolley system, but that has to be done away with now very soon. The company has been using for some time the storage system.

Mr. VEST. The language of the bill, I notice, is

"If electric wires or cables are used.

"If" they are used.

Mr. McMILLAN. There is no doubt that they may use a cable, I suppose, but they can not use overhead wires. That is absolutely prohibited.

Mr. VEST. I simply quote the language, which implies that they may use other power.

Mr. HARRIS. There is no other method except the trolley or overhead system, the storage battery, or the conduit system. The provision is exactly the same that was inserted, I think, upon the amendment of the Senator from Missouri a year or two ago in a similar measure. It will require putting under ground any wire or cable that is used for conducting the electric power.

Mr. MORGAN. Will it prohibit the use of horses for traction purposes?

Mr. McMILLAN. There will be no horses on this road.

Mr. VEST. It does not prohibit the use of them. I will say to the Senator from Michigan that the amendment I offered some years ago and which is now the law prohibited the use of overhead wires; that was all. But the language of this bill would permit them to use any power they saw proper. There is no inhibition on them at all. It simply says, "If electric wires or cables are used, * * * the same shall be placed under ground;" but it does not say what they shall use.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator from Missouri will look at the act providing for the extension on G street, passed two or three years ago, I think that the language in this bill is precisely the same as the language in that in respect of the power, and under that extension act storage batteries have been exclusively used. I think I can safely say that nothing else is contemplated in this extension than the use of storage batteries.

Mr. McMILLAN. I think that they do not contemplate using anything else.

Mr. VEST. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee a question. I am not so familiar with these streets as I possibly ought to be. Where would this road run on B street?

Mr. McMILLAN. It does not run on B street. It runs upon New Jersey avenue within 150 feet of B street. That was done at the request of the property-owners and people who live there. They agreed to that suggestion, so that the people could take cars coming to the Capitol here on New Jersey avenue; but objection was made to coming up to B street, and that was stricken out of the bill.

Mr. VEST. It runs then within 150 feet of B street?

Mr. McMILLAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARRIS. To the Baltimore and Ohio depot, within 150 feet of B street.

Mr. MORGAN. There ought to be a restriction in the bill against the use of horse power.

Mr. McMILLAN. The committee have no objection to an amendment of that kind. There is no danger of horse power being used, I can assure the Senator.

Mr. MORGAN. There is always danger when there is an opening for a railroad company.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator will suggest an amendment, there can be no objection to prohibiting the use of horse power.

Mr. McMILLAN. I have no objection to it.

Mr. MORGAN. In section 1, line 39, after the word "provided," I move to insert, "That horse power shall not be used on said line for traction purposes, and;" so as to read:

Provided, That horse power shall not be used on said line for traction purposes, and that if electric wires or cables are used to propel its cars over any of the routes hereby authorized within the limits of the city of Washington the same shall be placed under ground.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. McMILLAN. I move that the Senate request a conference with the House of Representatives upon the bill and amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. McMILLAN, Mr. HARRIS, and Mr. PERKINS were appointed.

EXCLUSION OF CHINESE.

Mr. DOLPH. I move to take up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 6185) to absolutely prohibit the coming of Chinese persons into the United States.

Mr. BATE. Why can we not go on with the Calendar regularly?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him.

Mr. BATE. Why can we not go on with the Calendar regularly?

Mr. DOLPH. As I explained when the bill was reported, in my judgment it is of the utmost importance that it shall receive early action, and if the bill is taken up I am going to give my reasons in support of my proposition.

Mr. BATE. I have no doubt it will get us into a general debate on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Oregon to take up the bill, and the motion is not debatable.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That all laws now in force prohibiting and regulating the coming into this country of Chinese persons and persons of Chinese descent are hereby continued in force for a period of ten years from the passage of this act.

SEC. 2. That any Chinese person or person of Chinese descent, when convicted and adjudged under any of said laws to be not lawfully entitled to be or remain in the United States, shall be removed from the United States to China, unless he or they shall make it appear to the justice, judge, or commissioner before whom he or they are tried that he or they are subjects or citizens of some other country, in which case he or they shall be removed from the United States to such country: Provided, That in any case where such other country of which such Chinese person shall claim to be a citizen or subject shall demand any tax as a condition of the removal of such person to that country, he or she shall be removed to China.

SEC. 3. That any Chinese person or person of Chinese descent arrested under the provisions of this act shall be adjudged to be unlawfully within the United States unless such person shall establish, by affirmative proof, to the satisfaction of such justice, judge, or commissioner, his lawful right to remain in the United States.

SEC. 4. That any such Chinese person or person of Chinese descent, once convicted and adjudged to be not lawfully entitled to be or remain in the United States, and having been once removed from the United States in pursuance of such conviction, who shall be subsequently convicted for a like offense, shall be imprisoned at hard labor for a period of not exceeding six months, and thereafter removed from the United States, as hereinbefore provided.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move to amend the text of the original House bill. In section 1, line 3, after the first word "that," I move to insert "for fifteen years;" so as to read:

That for fifteen years from and after the passage of this act it shall be unlawful for any Chinese person or persons, etc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER].

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, at the time I reported this bill I suggested that there was a necessity for speedy action on the part of the Senate, from the fact that the other House had not considered the Senate bill, but had sent to the Senate another bill, a House bill, so that neither bill could become a law without passing one branch of Congress. I stated that in my judgment there was no more reason why the Senate should act upon the House bill than why the House should act upon the Senate bill, and that if the House had amended the Senate bill by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting the House bill, the matter would have gone into conference and some agreement could probably have been arrived at by which some legislation could have been had extending the existing laws for the exclusion of Chinese.

I stated that in my judgment on the 6th day of May next the present law for excluding Chinese would expire. There seemed to be some question in the minds of some Senators as to whether I was correct or not, and I learn from the RECORD that the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations yesterday stated that he had given further examination to the subject and that he was clearly of the opinion that the existing laws will not expire until the 5th of July, 1894; that is, ten years from the passage of the amendatory act of 1884. I am sorry to be compelled to disagree in toto and emphatically with the position taken by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations and with any other Senator or lawyer who asserts that such is the proper construction of the act of 1884.

I had not when I reported the bill examined the authorities on the subject, but my own good judgment taught me that it must be that I was right. Since coming into the Senate Chamber this afternoon I have looked at some authorities, and I think I find authority to fully bear me out in my proposition. The first section of the act of May 6, 1882, is as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the expiration of ninety days next after the passage of this act, and until the expiration of ten years next after the passage of this act—

To this language I call the attention of my colleague, because I think he has fallen into an error by not closely examining this provision of the section. I repeat—

And until the expiration of ten years next after the passage of this act—

Not after the expiration of the ninety days—

And until the expiration of ten years next after the passage of this act, the coming of Chinese laborers to the United States be, and the same is hereby, suspended; and during such suspension it shall not be lawful for any Chinese laborer to come, or, having so come, after the expiration of said ninety days, to remain within the United States.

In 1884 we found it necessary to amend the law so as to provide that no Chinese laborers should come from any foreign port or place. The question having arisen whether they must not come from China under the original act and whether we could exclude when they came from an English or other foreign port, Congress amended the law. It amended the first section, and that is all that is necessary to consider in examining this proposition. It is all that throws any light upon the subject whatever. Instead of amending it by saying that there should be stricken out of it certain words or that there should be inserted in it certain words, it amended it by saying it should be amended "so as to read as follows." In interpreting an amendment to a statute it is important to observe the manner in which it is amended. Suppose we had merely provided that there should be inserted in the act the words which were inserted by this amendment of the act, "from any foreign port or place," would anyone contend that we had at all changed the time during which Chinese laborers were prohibited from coming into the United States by the original section? We would not have touched the question. But instead of amending it in that way we amended it by saying—

That section 1 of the act entitled "An act to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to the Chinese," approved May 6, 1882, is hereby amended so as to read as follows:

Section 1 of the act of 1884 provides—

That from and after the passage of this act, and until the expiration of ten years next after the passage of this act, the coming of Chinese laborers to the United States be, and the same is hereby suspended, and during such suspension it shall not be lawful for any Chinese laborer to come from any foreign port or place, or having so come to remain within the United States.

All that Congress was seeking to do was to provide that Chinese laborers should not come from any foreign port or place. They were not attempting to deal with the question of time during which they should be precluded from coming. They did omit the provision that they should not come after the expiration of ninety days, and why? Because that provision had expended its force; the ninety days had run. The prohibition against the coming of Chinese laborers did not take effect until after the expiration of ninety days from the time the original act had been passed, and therefore there was no necessity to repeat those words; they were no longer in force; they had performed the office it was intended they should perform.

Mr. MITCHELL. May I ask my colleague a question?

Mr. DOLPH. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL. Would not the construction of the amendatory act placed upon it by my colleague have the effect to shorten the period of suspension ninety days?

Mr. DOLPH. There is just where my colleague is mistaken, and that is what I am trying to explain to him. The original act did not provide that the Chinese should be prohibited from coming into the United States for ten years after the expiration of ninety days. There is where my colleague is in error. The original act provided that after the expiration of ninety days they should be precluded from coming for ten years from the passage of the act.

Mr. MITCHELL. The original act says in so many words:

That from and after the expiration of ninety days next after the passage of this act, and until the expiration of ten years next after the passage of this act, the coming of Chinese laborers to the United States be, and the same is hereby, suspended, and during such suspension it shall not be lawful for any Chinese laborer to come, or, having so come after the expiration of said ninety days, to remain within the United States.

Mr. DOLPH. I agree to that. My colleague has not changed my statement in regard to the matter at all. They could freely come for ninety days after the passage of the act. I suppose that was intended to enable those who were on shipboard on their way to the United States to come in, and then from that time until ten years from the passage of the act they were precluded from coming—not ten years from the expiration of ninety days, but ten years from the passage of the act. They were precluded only nine years and nine months by the original act from coming to the United States. So if the act of 1884 is read as part of the act of 1882 it does not change the time a particle, because it is said they are precluded from coming for ten years from the date of the passage of the act.

There is where my colleague has fallen into an error, in supposing that if the first section of the act of 1884 was inserted in the act of 1882 and read as part of it, it would shorten the time for which the Chinese were precluded from coming to the United States. That is not true. So, I say, that Congress was not dealing with the question of time. It only sought to amend the act by providing that Chinese should not come from any foreign port or place, and it did not change the time in which Chinese were prohibited from coming into the United States one moment, either to extend it or to shorten it, under that view of the case.

I had an impression—and I had not looked at the authorities when I made that report—my own judgment taught me that where you amend a section of a previous act "to read as follows," the section must be read just as if it were cut out and pasted in the original act in place of the section amended. I think I have found some authorities, hastily looking for them this morning since I came into the Senate Chamber, because I was absent when the Senator from Ohio made the statement yesterday, that bear me out. I read from the case of the People vs. Sweetser, in the 1st Dakota Reports, from the syllabus first:

An amendment becomes a part of the original act, whether it be the change of a word, figure, or line, or the striking out of an entire section, or striking out and inserting, or in any other way modifying or altering its provisions. When an amendatory act sets forth the entire sections amended, they are to be construed as introduced into the place of the repealed sections, and in view of the provisions of the original act after such introduction.

I now read from the opinion in the case:

As the provisions of section 4, act of 1872-73, applied to sections 1 and 2 of that act, and as section 1 has been repealed by the enactment of a substitute, it is now contended that there is no punishment prescribed for a violation of the provisions of the act of 1874-'75.

This was in regard to the licensing or sale of intoxicating liquors.

There might be something in this position were this act of 1874-'75 an independent, isolated act, perfect and complete in all its provisions, and not amendatory to the act of 1872-'73, nor necessarily connected with its provisions by its very language, as well as its relation to the same subject-matter, and having the same object and purpose. If the last act had amended the former one by reducing the penalty in the bond, or by enlarging or abridging its conditions, or had it struck out all of section 1 relating to a bond, and left it simply unlawful to sell without license, or had it struck out all relating to a license, and made it unlawful to sell without first filing the bond, would not the provisions of section 4 still have applied? Certainly so clear a proposition could not be questioned. If it could be amended piecemeal, now a part and then a part, until it might be an entirely new section, why might it not be done by one act, by at once striking out and inserting, or amending so as to read entirely different?

I think no principle plainer or better settled than that an amendment becomes a part of the original act, whether it be the change of a word, figure, or line, or the striking out of an entire section, or striking out and inserting, or in any other way modifying or altering its provisions.

Where an amendatory act sets forth the entire sections amended, they are to be construed as introduced into the place of the repealed sections, and in view of the provisions of the original act after such introduction. (McKibben vs. Lester, 9 Ohio N. S., 627.) Thus the words in the amendatory act "under the limitations herein provided" must be held to apply to the limitations of the original act after the amended sections are in place. (Ibid; also, Conrad vs. Nall, 24 Mich., 275.)

The amendment of a statute by a subsequent one operates, as to all acts done subsequent thereto, as though the amendment had been a part of the original statute. (Holbrook vs. Nichol, 36 Ill., 161.) And in England it has been held that where a new proviso was substituted for an old one in nearly the same terms, the new proviso and the original statute must be read as one act; i. e., as though the proviso had originally been in the amended form. (Queen vs. St. Giles, 3 E. & E., 224.) I therefore hold that section 1, chapter 21, laws of 1874-'75, was enacted in lieu of and took the place of section 1, chapter 25, laws of 1872-'73, the new being substituted for the old section, and that this new section and the old statute into which it has been inserted must be read as one act, as though it originally had been in the amended form, and any one violating its provisions is punishable as provided in section 4.

Mr. MITCHELL. May I ask my colleague a question?

Mr. DOLPH. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL. I wish to suggest to my colleague if, as he has stated, where the amended act is precisely the same, with no material change or amendment, it would read and stand as the original act, is it not the fact that where an amendatory act incorporates a new element or omits an element in the old one, then the act is to be read as of the date and from the date of the amendatory act?

Mr. DOLPH. These decisions are right contrary to that. Wherever you say that a section of a certain act shall be amended so as to read as follows, no matter what changes you make concerning it, it must be incorporated in and read as a part of the original act. Of course if it provides any new penalties or makes any new provisions it can only apply to acts committed after the amendment is made, but so far as the construction of it is concerned and so far as the act itself is affected by it, not considering acts already committed in violation of it, it must be read as part of the old act; it must be inserted in it.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to be permitted to put a suggestion or question to the honorable Senator from Oregon, if it is agreeable to him.

Mr. DOLPH. I shall be pleased to hear it.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask why it is profitable to discuss this matter at this time. If the Senator will pardon me for stating the attitude of it as I understand it, I should like to have him consider this view. There is no question that the Judiciary Committee have acted upon this suggestion or view of the law, in which his colleague differs from him, and the conclusion which his colleague has reached has been submitted to the full committee, but they have not yet acted upon it.

Mr. MITCHELL. The matter has been held back at my request that that element might not come here, in order that we might get early action upon the pending bill.

Mr. HOAR. Yes. I should like to say for myself that I was able to give a slight examination of the matter when it was first brought up in the committee, and I found myself at that time unable to concur with the junior Senator from Oregon in the conclusion which his colleague is now opposing, and my investigations brought me to the same results which the Senator from Oregon now on the floor has reached. But I had not time to examine the subject carefully; my capacity for such work was interrupted, and I have not been able to resume the inquiry. So I do not wish to be understood as expressing an opinion, but only an inclination.

However, it seems to me that there is no Senator here, whatever may be his views of this question or whatever may be his views on the policy of dealing with the Chinese, who would not agree first that this is a question of doubt, such eminent authorities as the two Oregon Senators among others differing about it. It being a question of doubt, whether they like or dislike the old act of 1882, the question whether this body of persons are entitled to come in here during the next three years in opposition to the almost unanimous will of both houses of the Legislature ought not to be left open.

Mr. DOLPH. I quite agree with the Senator, and I am coming to that point directly.

Mr. HOAR. Would anybody hesitate in passing a joint resolution to this effect, that the provisions of the act of 1882 shall be continued in force until a certain time in 1894?

Mr. DAWES. As amended.

Mr. HOAR. Yes; as amended. I think five minutes would settle the whole matter.

Mr. MITCHELL. It would still be better if we could pass this bill in some proper form before the 6th of May so as to avoid all question.

Mr. HOAR. Much may be said against this bill, which I, for one, may say if it is pressed as it stands now.

Mr. DOLPH. I quite agree that there should be no delay in acting upon the bill reported from the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, whether I am right or wrong in my premises. I was not attempting to discuss anything that had been done by the Committee on the Judiciary. I was entitled to address my colleague as I did on account of a conversation I had with him on this question, and I took the liberty of calling his attention to the fact that the coming of Chinese was only limited by the act of 1882 for ten years from the passage of the act. I do not think that it has been ever suggested to me that there should be any delay to act upon this bill until the Committee on the Judiciary can be heard from.

But inasmuch as the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations yesterday stated that he had examined it and had come to a satisfactory conclusion that the law did not expire until the 5th day of July, 1894, or that in substance, and as if that impression got out it might prevent us from coming to an agreement with the other House as to some legislation which is necessary to continue existing laws in force, I thought it was well for me to give my opinion of the law of the case. I regret, as I say, to differ from the chairman or other members of the Committee on Foreign Relations who have examined this question and agree with him, and I should extremely regret to find that my opinion on a question of law was not in accord with the opinion of a majority of the Committee on the Judiciary, but I can not help it. I have been in the habit all my life of disagreeing with people on questions of law and trying conclusions with them until some court of last resort determined which was right. That is the only way this question can be settled if it ever arises.

Now, what I contend is that where changes are made by an amendatory act the amendment becomes a part of the original statute, no matter what the changes are. If the section of an original act is amended "so as to read as follows," if it is amended so that the amended section takes the entire place of the original section, that section must be incorporated and read as a part of the original act. That is my proposition. As I said, that is not a very material question.

I read in one of the New York papers yesterday morning a dispatch from Seattle which stated that there were 2,000 Chinese in British Columbia along the line waiting their opportunity to come to the United States after the 6th of May; that the Six Companies had employed eminent counsel to defend them in attempting to come in and try in the courts the question as to their right to come.

It is very likely if we shall fail to get any legislation extending the existing laws on the subject that the Treasury Department may instruct its agents and collectors of customs to keep out the Chinese, but the moment a Chinese subject was prevented from landing in the United States he would sue out a habeas corpus and some inferior court would pass upon his right to come, and if the court held that he had a right to come, that the law preventing the coming in of Chinese had expired, that ruling would govern, I suppose, the executive department of the Government, and the question might not finally be determined by the Supreme Court of the United States for years. So if there is a difference of opinion, if the question is at all doubtful, it is the part of wisdom to act upon the supposition that the law will expire on the 6th of May and get additional legislation.

Mr. President, that is about all I desire to say. I had the honor to report a bill early in the session, which I introduced, I think, the first day when bills were in order, to extend the existing laws to prevent the coming of Chinese to this country, and making certain provisions to enable existing laws to be more thoroughly enforced. I believe it was satisfactory to all parties interested in the Senate; that is, reasonably so. It was so far satisfactory that they allowed it to pass without a word of opposition, and made no objection to it from the time it was reported until the time it was passed. As I said before, the other House, instead of acting upon that bill, ignored it entirely, and passed a separate bill requiring, in order that an act may be secured extending the provisions of the existing law, either that the other House shall still take up and act on the Senate bill or that we shall take up and act on the House bill.

The moment the bill came into the Senate—or as soon as I had an opportunity to do so—I had it referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. At the very first meeting of the committee they acted upon the bill. They acted upon it by striking out all after the enacting clause and substituting the Senate bill for it, a bill which has been once passed. Whatever may be said as to the necessity for more stringent legislation it seems to me that the part of wisdom now is to take up some measure that we can get through without unnecessary delay, that will continue existing legislation and enable it to be enforced, and then if the other branch of Congress wants to send us a more drastic measure on the subject all they have got to do is to take up the Senate bill, amend it to suit themselves, and send it here, or any Senator can introduce a Senate bill and send it to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I am anxious to do the most practical and the best thing to be done. I am anxious that some practical legislation shall be agreed upon by both branches of Congress and receive the approval of the President before the 6th of May, to at least continue existing legislation, and then I am willing to go on and consider any further propositions that may be made on this subject. That is all I desire to say.

Mr. FELTON. Mr. President, I first desire to say that I am in accord with what the Senator from Oregon has just said in regard to the importance of passing some measure at this time. It is evident that very able Senators upon this floor and lawyers disagree as to whether the existing law expires on the 6th of next May or two years thereafter; but I in no way agree with the Senator from Oregon in his last remark. I think it is better for all that whatever legislation we have at this time ought to be the best legislation we can get that will exclude these people, and as an evidence of why I desire it I propose to submit some remarks.

Mr. President, I approach this discussion with reluctance, conscious of the fact that there exists a sentiment among worthy citizens who, having little or no practical knowledge of this subject, are opposed to their exclusion, and as in past Congresses, this question has been very ably discussed, I can hope to add but little for your consideration; and, therefore, should have remained silent, but for the fact that I represent, in part, a constituency who have suffered from the evils of Mongolian immigration for over a third of a century, and who have learned by bitter experience the great economic and moral objections to the incoming of this people.

This question is political, social, and economic. It is a question of civilization, and we of the Pacific coast would preserve ours, the Western type, and not submit to the Eastern. To preserve ours we must exclude the other—the Eastern. They will not mingle or fuse, and were this possible the resulting type would have the vices of both without the virtues of either.

The Chinese race, born in the infancy of peoples, has as a race and nation existed for a period of time so vast as to be incomprehensible to the human intellect.

While the races of the West have come and gone, leaving scarcely an imprint to mark their existence, while they, under ever changing environments, have contended for existence and supremacy, mingled and formed new nations, of higher types and civilization, this single race has come down the ages, in one long, unbroken, undeviating line, uninfluenced by example or contact with the other or Western nations, they are the creation of one environment and unchanged conditions. For 3,000 years before the birth of Christ, and during their existence they have maintained without change the same religion, the same form of government, the same manners, habits, and customs.

A paternal form of government, the earliest known, in which the power of life and death has ever been at the will of the rulers, from the Emperor down to and including the head of families, and trial by peers unknown. Whatever the outward form of religion professed, and though, perhaps, conforming to its pomp and circumstance, the Chinese venerate and worship only the spirits of their ancestors. They are without God, without conscience, without charity, devoid of sympathy and gratitude—fatalists. They are a mighty nation, composing nearly one-half the population of the earth—a race to be feared. They are highly intelligent, with great comprehensive powers, persistent, cunning, patient, born diplomats, painfully industrious, frugal to parsimony—the question with them being not what they need, but what they can do without and sustain life.

Through five thousand years heredity, intensified by isolation, has produced and reproduced their race characteristics until they are concrete; unchangeable, mentally, physically, or morally. And though wherever they go they disseminate vices that kill mentally and physically and transmit their effect to the third and fourth generations, they are more to be feared for their virtues than their vices; born and innured through centuries to toil and privation there is no competing with them by those born in and accustomed to the requirements of Western civilization, however low the type may be. To do so life would not be worth the having.

Experience has taught us that wherever they are, regardless of disadvantages, that in whatever avenue of industry or labor they engage, they have, without exception, driven forth from thence all competition. They come to us without wealth and absorb ours. True, we have their labor, but its price is sent home to enrich the land of their birth, and thus are we monthly the poorer by millions of dollars that under other immigration would remain in and increase our national wealth. They consume but the minimum, the greater portion of which is imported from their native land, thus again depriving our citizens of the opportunities for labor, as consumption is a prerequisite to production. Their immigrations have been invasions. In no instance have they been welcomed to any country by its inhabitants; but, on the contrary, from their first migration down to the present time they have not only been met with protests, but persecution and bloodshed have been the result.

The history of their early migrations teaches us that though massacred by the tens of thousands and the deportation of the remainder, they have repeatedly returned and endured the same persecution and fate, until now they practically dominate and possess that land.

The history of their emigration to and deportment from the Philippine Islands is a "chapter of persecution," rapine, carnage, and horrors for nearly one hundred years.

There are other notable instances, had I the space to include them.

On our own soil, in this decade, history but repeated itself in the Rock Springs massacre, its perpetrators incited by the same cause, the same spirit, and giving the same reasons for the outrage as were given three hundred years ago. There must be some fundamental reason for these recurrences, and if this people are permitted to further invade us we must expect repetitions.

In all the history of their migration there is no instance of their ever having assimilated with any other race, submitting or conforming to its laws, religion, or customs. Race prejudices and antipathies innate in mankind were too resistant. Change of conditions, however great, has never produced any change in them. They, under all conditions and circumstances, have remained true to their civilization. Wherever they are, they are a people apart, without social intercourse with other races.

Races so dissimilar can not assimilate and hence can not exist together in unity, peace or prosperity—one or the other must survive and the older, the simple, will exhaust the newer and more complex. This is a law of nature, and China, with from six hundred and fifty to seven hundred and fifty millions of people to draw from, if permitted, will possess this land.

In the earlier history of our nation, when society was comparatively simple and our country sparsely settled, our forefathers were imbued with the French theories of "liberty, equality, and fraternity," and declared this land a "refuge for the oppressed and destitute of all nations." They believed that a Democracy, pure and simple, would evolve a high state of civilization, in which all mankind should and would share.

Since which time the great teacher "Experience" has taught us "wisdom," and that the extreme theories of the brotherhood of mankind were inconsistent and impossible with a complex state of society; that other factors than fraternity and benevolence were necessary to build up and preserve the nation and its civilization. That the fundamental principle underlying human nature is selfishness—deny it who may—one of self-preservation, "enlightened selfishness," and without which civilization would not have reached its present high type; that to preserve this it was necessary to protect it, not only from bad civilizations, but from the pauper, the criminal, the vagabond, and anarchist elements from whatever source they might come. That an intelligent people was necessary to perpetuate a government "of the people" and rule by public opinion. That to become intelligent both time and means were required for education; that to procure these the laborer must be protected and a more general diffusion of wealth among the masses must be provided, and that by the only possible method, viz, an increase in their wages and the reduction of the hours of labor, now made possible by "natural power, engendered and put forth by material objects," the elements being the motive power directed by the hand of labor, the result a multiplication of production and wealth many fold. That for the creation of wealth the law of supply and demand must operate conjointly, consumption being necessary for production, and that to consume labor must be employed, and, as an economic writer puts it, "to enlarge the social opportunities of the masses."

And hence, in consonance with this new and practical economic sentiment, we have legislated against the importation of the products of cheap labor, we have passed laws against the incoming of the low-price and contract labor of Europe, of paupers, convicts, insane, and vagabonds, and to prevent the influx of the most immoral and the cheapest of all labor, the Mongolian. But our laws are incomplete, they are defective, hence evaded, and, in consequence, do not meet the desired end.

These defects more especially apply to the exclusion of the Chinese; as it is far more difficult, next to impossible, to legislate against a race that has nothing in common with us, but whose interest and sentiment are averse to ours and who have no regard for the sanctity of an oath, than against a race of our own type.

The Chinese have a sovereign contempt for our civilization and no regard for our rights or laws; and when we contemplate that in their veins courses the blood of over fifty centuries, without an alien taint, is it remarkable that they should feel their superiority, and have no respect for our civilization or God, whom they say man killed? They have laws unto themselves: unwritten laws, traditions, which bind and govern them. With them the end justifies the means, and that end, however accomplished, is their migration from an overpopulated and poverty-stricken land—where the struggle for life is so severe that the old, the infirm, the incurable sick, and the female infant are thrown into the gutter to starve and die, as they could not produce but would consume; where the laws permit of the parents selling their offspring into slavery; where woman is a chattel and supposed to be without a soul; where the punishment for crime includes both the death of the offender and that of all of his relatives over 16 years of age, and by cruel and barbarous methods; where individuals are bitten to death by their fellow-craftsmen for an infringement of their rule—to that Western land where a mixture of the Caucasian race have come, assimilated, and created a free, humane, and enlightened Government and phenomenal wealth.

On the western shores of this continent, in Australasia, and upon the islands of the Pacific Ocean, whose farther waters brake on the shores of the Yellow Sea, have met the tides of immigration which parted company on the plains of Asia at some prehistoric period—the one going East, the other West, and there has commenced the struggle which shall determine which civilization shall predominate—the simple or the complex? And the action taken by us to-day may, and probably will, influence the destiny of a nation for good or evil.

The question now is, shall we exclude this people? And if answered in the affirmative, then we must ignore all sentimentality and technicalities and, without delay, by direct methods exclude.

But some say to do so, granting the necessity, would be violating treaty obligations. In this I do not agree with them. As it is contended by the highest authorities on international law, and as the highest tribunal in our land has decided that under our Constitution treaties and statutes are alike the laws of the land, and hence the latest act of the treaty or legislative making power must prevail over any previous act, it follows that a Federal statute contrary to a provision of a treaty necessarily repeals that portion of the treaty. And as a treaty, under the law and usages of nations, is simply an agreement between two or more powers for their mutual advantage and depends for its duration and validity upon equity. (Most treaties from their very nature are transitory.) Where conditions change and that which was intended to be mutual and equitable proves to be the reverse and either party is injured thereby, treaties naturally are and should be modified or ignored in the interests of justice and national safety.

Says one high authority on international law:

A treaty pernicious to the state is null, and not at all obligatory, as no conductor of a nation has the power to enter into engagements to do such things as are capable of destroying the state for whose sake the government is intrusted to him.

Says the same writer:

The nation itself, being necessarily obliged to perform everything required for its preservation and safety, can not enter into engagements contrary to its indispensable obligations.

Another uses the words:

A total change of the circumstances renders a treaty no longer obligatory.

And a very able lawyer and writer says:

It is not to be permitted that the liberties, the prosperity, the evolution and development of nations should be arrested by the weight of unchangeable treaties, which, under verbal forms, might place the industries and the social and political interests of a country in jeopardy.

Such conditions now exist between the Governments of the Empire of China and the United States by reason of the Burlingame treaty.

The effect of this treaty has been and is anything but mutual or equitable. While a portion of her race occupy our soil we are practically prevented from entering the "Flowery Kingdom" for either pleasure or profit. While we have, say, two hundred thousand of this people in the United States, there are less than eleven hundred Americans, all told, in China. They are absorbing our substance and returning no equivalent for the same. Our civilization is threatened; our industries paralyzed wherever they appear; our labor driven from employment; our women and children prevented from earning their bread; they have arrayed section against section; have and are disturbing the peace and prosperity of the land. Their presence means ruin to our laboring classes, and hence greatly complicates the labor question, fast becoming a high political one, and one that confounds the ablest thinkers—hence these very conditions have rendered the treaty nugatory.

Article 5 of this treaty has strikingly shown the want of statesmanship by those who negotiated and accepted it. It has proved to be not only unwise, but an outrage upon the social and material interests of the whole nation. I quote it:

Cordially recognizes the inherent and inalienable right of man to change his home and allegiance and also the mutual advantages of the migration and emigration of their citizens and subjects, respectively, from the one country to the other for purposes of curiosity, of trade, or as permanent residents.

The advantages of this section have almost wholly inured to the benefit of the Chinese; but, conceding the principle, is not the right to prevent for cause inherent? Otherwise it would be illogical and absurd.

This article also contains a proviso that certain laws shall be passed by both the contracting powers concerning the forced immigration of coolies and making it a penal offense, viz:

For a citizen of the United States or Chinese subject to take Chinese subjects either to the United States or any other foreign country, or for a Chinese subject or citizen of the United States to take citizens of the United States to China or to any other foreign country, without their free and voluntary consent, respectively.

In pursuance of which the United States enacted stringent laws for the carrying out of that provision. China, however, has utterly failed and neglected to pass such a law or to take any effective steps to prevent emigration under contract and by compulsion, and it is a well-known fact that there are many instances where this provision has been ignored; where Chinese subjects have been sold for a certain period to labor, and some for vilest purposes, have been compelled to emigrate and fulfill their contract. I think it is within the truth to say that 50 per cent of those here came in violation of this article and of our contract-labor law. (I have a copy of a contract, authenticated by a minister of the gospel, which I would append to my remarks were it not too indecent for publication.)

China has committed a flagrant violation of this most important provision of the treaty.

Article 6 in effect provides, that while "the United States grants to the Chinese the right of access, of travel, trade, or permanent residence," in any and all parts of our country, without restriction, China only grants to the citizens of the United States simply the right to reside in certain seaports beyond the precincts of which they are not permitted to go under pains and penalties.

Under these conditions, that is, the utter inequality of this treaty, its injustice to the American people, the violation by the Chinese of its most essential provisions, to the injury of our moral sentiments, and industries, we should not hesitate to abrogate this treaty and preserve our civilization, our institutions, and people.

Why should we at this time hesitate to exclude? We have already in the passage of the Scott law abrogated a portion of the treaty, and it has been so decided by the highest judicial tribunal in the land.

Mr. President, my objection to the pending bill is that it is practically a reenactment of the present law, which has not and can not answer the end for which it was intended. Its only practical effect has been to turn the tide of this immigration from an American line of steamers to San Francisco to a British line of steamers to Victoria, British Columbia, where the Canadian Government receives $50 a head for their reception and the United States gains the Chinaman all the same, as it is a notorious fact that their numbers have increased but slightly in Canada, and that they have come over our 3,000 miles of northern border practically whenever they desired. And this measure provides no protection against that illegal invasion. The cost of policing that distance to prevent their incoming renders it impossible.

The substitute which I have offered contains a provision for a system of registration of those now in the country which might be practicable and accomplish the desired end. It certainly is worth a trial.

It perpetrates no indignity or hardship upon those now in this country and entitled to remain, if they are honest. But it will probably prevent the illegal incoming of others by collusion and false oaths.

I also object to the pending bill as it reenacts the "merchant" clause, which provides for the return of this supposed class by certificate.

This provision of the law has proved a fruitful source of fraud, corruption, and conspiracy, and the evasion of the spirit and intent of the law.

There is no "merchant class" in the sense we use the word; they are traders among themselves and as a rule in a small way. They are of the coolie class (with rare exceptions) and on a par only with the laboring class, and receive no greater consideration, save on account of their wealth, for which the Chinese have the profoundest respect. When the coolie laborer desires to return to his native land, be he a laborer in the field, factory, or household servant, he becomes a merchant by paying into some trading establishment a matter of $50 or $100 and departs for his native land.

If he shall desire to return he is provided with the certificate for that purpose; if not, he sells it to one of his kind, posts him in regard to localities, and when he comes he presents his certificate, and if his identity (which is exceedingly difficult to determine) is questioned, he unhesitatingly commits perjury, is set free, by the "sacred habeas corpus" writ (a process unknown in Asia), and when the time set to determine his identity shall have arrived he has disappeared, leaving only an utterly worthless bond made acceptable under the law by the false oaths of his bondsmen.

Sir, I would prevent the shame and outrage of these daily impositions upon our people and their demoralizing influence.

From whence emanates this sentiment of opposition to their exclusion? Can it be possible that in this land of intelligence and plenty that this opposition should be instigated by the sordid motives of a few that prefer immediate gain to the perpetuity of our civilization and institutions, the peace and prosperity of the masses of our people? Is this objection from a commercial standpoint? If so, let me inform those high-minded patriots, with a lively appreciation of their own interests, that they know nothing of the character of this race. The Chinese do not now nor will they purchase from any source anything whatsoever that they can do without; they will purchase from the cheapest source; they will sell to us all they have, if we will pay for it, for the reason that they are confronted with conditions that compel them to do so. To do otherwise would mean their starvation.

Mr. President, the people of the Pacific coast do not desire to maltreat, to persecute, or to deport the Chinese now within our borders. They recognize their rights under the treaty to remain and enjoy them until they voluntarily leave, and hence do not desire to interfere with them. But we would and will, if possible, prevent the further incoming of this race or the return of those who shall voluntary leave.

We would have this nation follow nature's laws and integrate a higher type of our civilization, one more distinct, special, more American, and would protect its evolution from all danger, real or threatened. We would first take care of ourselves, recognizing that in so doing we were making our "greatest contributions to the welfare of humanity."

In other words, Mr. President, we would not permit the purity and sweetness of our national waters to be contaminated or polluted by the mingling of its pure streams with the impure from any source whatsoever. We would first use of them whatever portion we require and then permit them to flow on and to the fullest extent possible purify the noxious streams of less fortunate conditions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER].

Mr. DOLPH. I ask that the amendment may be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 1, line 3 of the text, after the word "that," insert the words "for fifteen years;" so as to read:

That for fifteen years from and after the passage of this act it shall be unlawful for any Chinese person or persons, etc.

Mr. PLATT. May I inquire how that amendment comes before the Senate? I thought there was an amendment to the bill proposed by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that this is an amendment proposed to the text of the bill which is proposed to be stricken out by the amendment of the committee. It is a perfection of the text that is proposed to be stricken from the bill by the committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I think it is but right for me to state the general view that was taken by the Committee on Foreign Relations with respect to this bill and also my own opinion as to the best mode of disposing of the subject-matter.

The bill as it came to us from the House of Representatives contains severe restrictions such as would read very strangely in a law of the United States. It seems to me that in severity of language and in its prohibition of the ordinary rights of humanity it goes far beyond any bill that probably was ever introduced into the Congress of the United States.

Mr. MITCHELL. If the Senator will allow me I will state that the bill is a precise copy, with one or two verbal amendments, of a bill that I introduced here seven years ago and have been introducing at every session, and which has I think received the approval of the press generally of the Pacific coast.

Mr. SHERMAN. That does not at all conflict with what I have stated. I shall read some of the sections. When the bill came before the Committee on Foreign Relations it was fairly considered, and it was deemed best on the whole by that committee, without division of opinion, that instead of passing this very severe measure, some of the provisions of which might probably be tolerated and some of the provisions of which ought not to be as we thought inserted in any law of the United States, a better way to deal with this question would be to postpone action upon the bill practically and to provide for the continuance of the present regulations restricting Chinese immigration for a period of ten years.

When the report was made it was assumed as a matter of course upon the face of the act of 1882 that the existing law would expire on the 6th of May, 1892. Afterwards, it is true, upon further examination of the law of 1884 and of the amendments that have been made to it there was an opinion prevailing with some Senators, with many Senators I may say, that the present restrictions on Chinese immigration would not expire until 1894, and therefore that there was no special hurry for action upon this matter. But I admit that if there is a doubt about this point, if the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] may be right that the act of 1884 does not extend the time for ten years after the passage of that act, we ought not, in the face of the possibility that the courts of the United States would take a different view of the law and construe the act of 1884 as simply a repetition of the law of 1882, that doubt ought not to be disregarded. If there is a fair doubt on that subject this or some measure in regard to continuing existing restrictions on Chinese immigration ought to pass. It was in that view that the Committee on Foreign Relations, adopting the ideas suggested by the Senator from Oregon, reported as a substitute for the House bill, a bill it had previously agreed to, to extend the present laws, with some additional provisions, ten years from the 6th of May, 1892. The amendment suggested by the Committee on Foreign Relations is very short, and I will simply name its provision. It provides—

That all laws now in force prohibiting and regulating the coming into this country of Chinese persons and persons of Chinese descent are hereby continued in force for a period of ten years from the passage of this act.

Then section 2 provides for certain penalties against Chinese who "when convicted and adjudged under any of said laws to be not lawfully entitled to be or remain in the United States, shall be removed from the United States to China." It provides for the removal of those whom it shall be ascertained are here unlawfully, against the spirit of the existing law.

Section 3 of the substitute provides for a rather novel rule of law; it was so regarded by lawyers:

That any Chinese person or person of Chinese descent arrested under the provisions of this act shall be adjudged to be unlawfully within the United States unless such person shall establish, by affirmative proof, to the satisfaction of such justice, judge, or commissioner, his lawful right to remain in the United States.

Throwing the burden of proof upon the Chinamen who are here. The fourth section provides:

That any such Chinese person or person of Chinese descent, once convicted and adjudged to be not lawfully entitled to be or remain in the United States, and having been once removed from the United States in pursuance of such conviction, who shall be subsequently convicted for a like offense, shall be imprisoned at hard labor for a period of not exceeding six months, and thereafter removed from the United States, as hereinbefore provided.

The bill as reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations does continue in full force all the laws and regulations now in existence under the act of 1884, or under the act of 1882, or under another act which was passed in 1888. All the restrictions, limitations, etc., which from time to time have been deemed proper to prevent the importation of Chinese laborers into this country are continued in full force for ten years after the passage of the act which is assumed to be before either of the present acts would expire. Besides that, it adds very severe penalties to those who are here now in fraud of our law or in disregard of the operations of the laws, who have come here from Canada or from other places without having the right to come here under existing law.

It seems to me it is much wiser to adopt some such provision as this, at least for the present, and if hereafter experience shows that a far more rigid law should be applied it may be furnished from time to time as occasion shall arise.

That was the view taken by the Committee on Foreign Relations. My own impression is, and my conviction is, that it would be better for the Senate if they take the same view of the subject-matter that the committee did and agree to this amendment, without going into any detailed examination of the original law, without examining it too closely, and let the whole subject go to a committee of conference, where the matter may be fairly considered, and if there is any additional restriction, any additional penalty or obligation necessary, it may be fairly considered in a committee of conference, and then it can be brought before us for approval or disapproval.

On the other hand, an attempt to patch up or change the bill sent to us by the other House, it seems to me would leave a very harsh and cruel law, against the spirit of our civilization, contrary to all the ideas that have been taught us as belonging to every man of every race and of every clime, unchristian, adopting the extreme policy of the Chinese of old, who forbade for generations upon generations any person of any other race coming among them except the Asiatic races. Indeed, we should fall back upon the very principles and policy which we warred against and which the European nations warred against when China was compelled to open her doors to the progress of modern civilization.

Let us look at the sections of the bill passed by the other House. It is not necessary for me to go into any detailed argument about the measure. I will read the sections, and let us see whether the Senate of the United States is prepared to adopt this worse than Draconian code in order to prevent this evil. I do not doubt from my observations in San Francisco that Chinese immigration is injurious and ought to be restricted; but under existing laws it has been restricted. There are now fewer Chinese in California than there were ten years ago. I have the census tables before me. There was a very careful statement and a very careful analysis made of the Chinese population, and it turns out that in 1880 we had more Chinese in this country than we had in 1890.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the chairman of the committee allow me to state that while that may be true—I do not know how it is—so far as California is concerned, it is a fact as shown by the census, as I think the Senator will find, that since 1882 there has been an increase in the United States at large of 30,000 Chinese?

Mr. FELTON. If the Senator from Ohio will permit me, I would simply like to observe in reply to what he has just stated that I think no dependence can be placed upon the census about the number of Chinese. In so far as they can they will not permit of being recorded. I know that to be a fact from a personal experience of a third of a century. They are averse to it. I have no idea that the census of Chinese is correct.

Mr. SHERMAN. We must take the official documents that are furnished to us as the best evidence after all, because whatever opinions gentlemen may form about the refusal of Chinese to be registered they do not weigh in the scale. It is the interest and object of every enumerator of the census to put down all these classes.

In reply to the observation made by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL], as I understand from this table there was no separate record of Chinese except in California, and therefore I do not know upon what basis he can state that the number of Chinese in the United States has increased. According to the statements here made it seems there was a very careful examination and enumeration made in California. I will read what is stated in this census bulletin:

A special count by race was also made by this office for the State of California, in order to separate the Chinese and Indians from the rest of the population, as required by the laws of that State, for the purposes of State apportionment. The results of this special count are shown by counties in the following table. For the State as a whole the white population has increased from 767,181 in 1880 to 1,111,558 in 1890, an increase of 344,377, or 44.89 per cent.

Nearly 50 per cent, we will say.

The colored population in the State shows an increase during the decade of 5,419, or 90.05 per cent, while there has been a decrease in the Chinese of 3,451, or 4.59 per cent. The whole number of Indians in the State is less in 1890 than in 1880 by 3,922, or a decrease of 24.10 per cent. The number of Japanese in 1890 as compared with 1880 is large, although relatively small as compared with the whole population. The number of Japanese returned in 1890 is 1,090, as against 86 in 1880. The total population of the State for 1890 is 1,338,130, as compared with 894,694 for 1880, the increase being 343,436, and the per cent of increase 39.72.

Here are the counties given, showing that in most of the counties of California there was a very large decrease in the number of Chinese. In San Francisco I believe the number had increased. I will ask the Senator from California if the county of San Francisco embraces much territory besides the city?

Mr. FELTON. Scarcely any.

Mr. SHERMAN. I see that in San Francisco, which is the city, the number of Chinese was 25,870 in 1890 while it was 21,745 in 1880. Consequently the Chinese population has increased about 4,000 in the city of San Francisco, but it has very largely decreased and is very slender indeed in most of the other counties of California. So under the operation of the existing law, which was passed two or three years after the census of 1880 and its full operation did not take effect until under the law of 1884, the actual number of Chinese in California has decreased. It is to be presumed in the absence of any other evidence that in the other parts of the United States the number has decreased. We know that there are scarcely any east of the Missouri River.

Mr. MITCHELL. If the Senator will allow me, it seems to me that just the reverse ought to prevail, because California is where they come, and they scatter out gradually over the United States.

Mr. SHERMAN. If they have actually decreased in California, to which they come, and it is very natural there would be a larger population of them there as it is nearer their home, it is not likely that they have increased in other parts of the country. At any rate there is no evidence of it.

Mr. MITCHELL. There has been an overflow from California all the time.

Mr. SHERMAN. The gentlemen who provided for the census did not require a special count of Chinese in the other parts of the country, nor have I heard the probable number stated. I appeal to the experience of every Senator and to his knowledge whether there is any considerable number of Chinese coming to our own country. I know in the State of Ohio the number is absolutely infinitesimal, and I presume that east of the Missouri River there are very few. I can not say how many there are, but only here and there may be seen a Chinese sign that a man from that country washes clothes.

This, then, although an evil which it was proper to arrest, is not a threatening evil. It is not now a growing evil. The trouble, I understand, grows by the unlawful introduction of Chinese from Canada, from the city of Vancouver, across our border. Here and there no doubt they drift into our country; yet after all there are more going out than there are coming in.

Is it worth while, therefore, to meet this diminishing evil, for us to resort to such drastic and extreme legislation as is proposed here? Let me turn again to the bill and let us see what are its provisions, and whether it is wise on the whole for the Senate of the United States to pass the House bill under the heat of a local feeling. It is a feeling in which we sympathize with our friends, but we wish they would mitigate this evil in somewhat of a modern and Christian way.

I have no doubt in time the Chinese population in San Francisco will rapidly decrease, and under the operations of the measure proposed by the Senate committee here, with the severe penalties that are provided against those who are brought in unlawfully and who are not now here in our country, the number will gradually diminish. They go away. The natural instinct of the Chinaman is to go home to die. His dead body goes if he does not go before death. The tendency is in that direction. There are no ties of family; there is nothing to induce these people to stay here, and I have no doubt, feeling as they do that they are unwelcome guests here, that they are not in harmony with our civilization, the number of these people will gradually diminish.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question, which he can answer as he goes along?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL. I assume that the bills in both Houses proceed upon the assumption that Chinese immigration to this country is a great evil and ought to be suspended or prohibited, one or the other. Now, what is the precise objection to the House bill? Is it because it violates the treaty between this country and China? Is that the objection?

Mr. SHERMAN. I was just about coming to that point.

Mr. MITCHELL. In this connection I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations to the fact that the act which is proposed to be extended by the amendment of the Foreign Relations Committee is just as much a violation of the treaty in my judgment as is the House bill, because that act, which is known as the Scott exclusion act, which was passed October 1, 1888, provides that any Chinese laborer now in this country, or who was in this country at the date of the passage of that act, and who had left the country and had not returned before the passage of the act, should be absolutely and forever excluded from returning, which is in direct contravention of the provisions of the treaty of 1880.

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. FRYE. I wish to read a telegram which I received from C. P. Huntington, who is now in California, and whose very business leads him to examine into these matters pretty carefully:

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., April 15, 1892.

Hon. W. P. FRYE.

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Since my arrival here have learned what effect the passage of Geary bill would have on both Chinese and Americans. Thousands of Chinese in transit across the United States landing at ports under regulations made by Secretary of Treasury, January, 1883, have paid American transportation companies since restriction act over $350,000 for transportation alone. Should that bill become a law this traffic would go to foreign companies, via Canada and Panama. Since passage of restriction law, custom-house records show 22,000 more departures than arrivals at this port. Hundreds of wealthy Chinese merchants representing firms here have gone to China and other countries on business under faith of existing laws, having property interests here valued at hundreds of thousands of dollars. The Geary bill would debar them from returning and virtually confiscate their property. Much has been said about thousands of Chinese crossing the boundary from Canada. Collectors of British Columbia report for 1891, 3,275 arrivals at British Columbia ports, and 2,277 departures for China. I trust good business sense of American people and love of fair play and justice will find expression in Congress sufficiently strong to defeat this wicked bill. Our West coast possessions were obtained in the first half of this century by the best and greatest men in our country as much or more to secure the commerce of the orient as for the territory itself. California has the best climate in the world and her soil is unsurpassed, so if the commerce of the 400,000,000 people of China is not disturbed, it can be said that they, the great men who secured California to the Republic, builded better than they knew.

C. P. HUNTINGTON.

Mr. MITCHELL. I should like the Senator to read that portion—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, but I hope after this I shall not be interrupted further.

Mr. MITCHELL. I shall not interrupt any more. The telegram was read before my attention was called to it, and I should like to hear that portion of it read which speaks about certain Chinese going away.

Mr. FRYE. It was about the merchants, was it?

Mr. BUTLER. No, about the number going away.

Mr. MITCHELL. The number who had gone away and who would not return.

Mr. FRYE. The portion of the telegram to which the Senator refers is as follows:

Since passage of restriction law custom-house records show 32,000 more departures than arrivals at this port. Hundreds of wealthy Chinese merchants, representing firms here, have gone to China and other countries on business under faith of existing laws having property interests here valued at hundreds of thousands of dollars. The Geary bill would debar them from returning and virtually confiscate their property.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, as the Senate can see, I am not making a formal and set speech, but merely calling attention to the elements of this proposition. I wish now to read the bill which has been sent to us from the House of Representatives. It is provided in section 1:

That from and after the passage of this act it shall be unlawful for any Chinese person or persons, whether subjects of the Chinese Empire or otherwise, as well as those who are now within the limits of the United States, and who may hereafter leave the United States—

That is, if a Chinese person goes beyond the limits of the United States and wants to come back again, whatever may be the motive that led him away, if he comes back again—and who may hereafter leave the United States and attempt to return as those who have never been here, or, having been here, have departed from the United States (save and excepting only the following classes, that is to say—

Here are the exceptions—but before reading the exceptions I will read the language through—have departed from the United States (save and excepting only the following classes, that is to say: Such Chinese person or persons as may be duly accredited to the Government of the United States as ministers plenipotentiary or other diplomatic representatives, consuls general, consular and commercial agents, including other officers of the Chinese or other governments traveling upon the business of that Government, with their body and household servants), to come to or within, or to land at any port or place within the United States; and the coming of Chinese persons to the United States, whether for the purpose of transit only or otherwise, excepting the classes hereinbefore specifically described and excepted from and after the passage of this act be, and the same is hereby, absolutely prohibited.

Mr. President, the former law went upon the idea that the Chinese laborers, the Coolies, this degraded class of population should be excluded from the United States. It was difficult, I remember, when those laws were being passed to describe precisely the character of such Chinese as we wished to exclude, but it was then admitted and it is conceded on all hands that among the Chinese, as among other peoples, there are persons of education and standing, great merchants, dealers in large transactions, men whose commerce is of immense value to our country, honest producers, as well as the floating class which naturally come first into the United States. The idea, then, was, going upon the same principle that we are now seeking to enforce against other foreigners, that we should exclude the vicious, the criminal classes, the paupers, those who were naturally, from their habits and associations, degraded and would tend to degrade our civilization.

We applied the same rule to the Chinese then, only in a broader way, than we do to all other nations, although we can not succeed in every case and exclude them, but we allowed merchants, traders, dealers, educated persons, all persons not in the proscribed class to come to our country. They do not come to any great extent, but they come more or less, some of them very intelligent, respectable men.

The first section of this bill not only prevents anybody, except the few I will name hereafter, however educated and refined, whatever may be their interest here, their commerce, their trade relations—they are 400,000,000 people—every man of them except the few I will mention is forbidden to land upon our shores. If they do land they are liable to be sent to prison for five years, as I will show hereafter, an absolute Draconian decree, it seems to me, and it is a barbarous one for us. There is no occasion for it, and it could only be justified by circumstances which do not now exist.

If we have not extended this exclusion heretofore to the right persons, we should define them and describe them better, and certainly not exclude the whole race of four hundred million human beings with an older civilization far than we can boast of, with great wealth, great commerce, vast cities, with every sign of modern civilization, now adopting our rapid modes of transit, employing our railroad and telegraph and telephone systems, and adopting the most advanced works of civilization of our country and of Europe. We exclude these people absolutely, so that no Chinaman can come here without as much difficulty as Marco Polo had who explored China and who was the only man of all the European race who for ages had entered that kingdom. He had all sorts of adventures, some of which are told. I have no doubt, with a great deal of freedom, but, Mr. President, do we desire to adopt that kind of civilization? Whom do we admit? Whom do we except from this rule? Let us see.

(Save and excepting only the following classes, that is to say: Such Chinese person or persons as may be duly accredited to the Government of the United States as ministers plenipotentiary or other diplomatic representatives, consuls general, consular and commercial agents, including other officers of the Chinese or other governments traveling upon the business of that Government, with their body and household servants.)

Then, there is a provision that even those body servants must be described in order to distinguish them from the rest, according to regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury. We admit, therefore, none but the diplomatic and consular representatives of China. Why should they come here? What would consuls come to this country for except to look after the interests of their country and the interests of their countrymen? As a matter of course, if you exclude all the people of China, you exclude the whole consular service. What would consuls come here for except to look after the property, the rights, and interests of their people?

What is a diplomatic representative sent here for? Is there anything wrong or indecent or improper in the conduct of the legation which comes here? Why should their minister come if the Chinese are all to be excluded? Why make this exception? Why not say to the Chinese, their civilization, and population of four hundred millions of people, "None of you shall come here except a diplomatic representative?" For what purpose? Why should they send a minister here? Sir, the passage of such a bill as this is sure to break off all the diplomatic relations between the United States and China.

What, then, becomes of our commerce? We are dependent upon China for tea. We have a vast commerce with China. I have not the figures before me, because the statement I am now making is upon the spur of the moment, but you know it amounts to many millions of dollars, and we were compelled to get our teas for a time through England, and we could not get any tea here except it came through certain houses in England; but more recently we have direct communication with China, and we have lines of ships bringing their productions here. Why, sir, you pass this bill, and not only will you have no Chinese diplomatists here, no consuls here, but you will have no relations with them, you will have no commerce with them. China would send her tea to the city of Vancouver, now springing up rapidly on the Pacific coast, and which, under this Draconian system, will soon rival San Francisco in its commerce and trade, and which is even now a most beautiful place. It is a place marked out for a city. The city of Vancouver may some day rival San Francisco if you cut off all the great Pacific coast commerce from the United States.

Mr. President, it seems to me that while we are desiring to accomplish a good object and to limit so far as we can by reasonable and proper laws the immigration of Chinese and cool laborers, we ought not to do anything which would disturb our diplomatic relations with China. We have thousands of American citizens in China, amongst them some of the very best of our land, men and women full of religious fervor who go there to teach the principles of our religion. What would result to them, what would result to the property of our merchants in those cities? We bombarded them in order to compel them to open their doors to the entrance of our people and our missionaries, and now we are excluding their diplomatists and consuls, for why should they come when no Chinaman can be allowed to come here?

You may deal with the Chinese nation as you may with a weak and feeble power. They never will invade you except in a peaceful way. If you choose to limit their power to invade you in this way you can do it. They are not dangerous enemies, but they are very dangerous in a commercial sense, and that great Empire of China can fill the commerce of all the European nations with their untold wealth, with their coffers and with their trade, and we shall be excluded from all commercial relations with them. They are the best aids to our friends in the West, for they, with India, take nearly all the silver or a large proportion of the silver of which there is now rather too much on our hands.

Why, Mr. President, it does seem to me that this absolute exclusion of the whole Chinese race at a single stroke is one of those things which ought to cause Senators at least to pause a while before they fall into a maelstrom which may go far beyond the limits of their vision.

Now, let us follow this bill a little further, because there is nothing better to illustrate my views than reading the language of the bill itself. Here is another provision:

SEC. 2. That the master of any vessel who shall knowingly bring within the United States on such vessel and land, or attempt to land or permit to be landed, any Chinese person, excepting such whose coming into the United States is not prohibited by this act, from any foreign port or place, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, be punished by a fine of not more than $500 for each and every such Chinese person so brought, and may also be imprisoned for a term not exceeding one year, etc.

There any vessel which happens to take on board a Chinese laborer, a marine, a sailor—and the Chinese are among the best sailors in the world, as we know by history and description—or cooks, or washermen, or men in any kind of humble pursuit, if that Chinaman lands at San Francisco for any purpose, this vessel is responsible in these damages and the captain of that vessel may be sent to the penitentiary for one year.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask the Senator if that is not the existing law?

Mr. SHERMAN. It only applies to certain classes of persons.

Mr. MITCHELL. That law the Senator proposes to extend.

Mr. SHERMAN. It only applies to certain classes of persons. It would not apply to a gentleman who came here. Probably ten or twenty millions of Chinamen are not within the prohibition of existing law. A Chinese merchant, a Chinese who does not happen to be within the commercial or diplomatic service can not come here, a man of education, and there are among these Chinamen men of the highest education, who know as much of the arts and sciences as we do in our most favored land, and yet for bringing such a person here—if he remained on ship-board out on the ocean, he probably would not come within the penalties of this bill, but if he was landed at San Francisco to see that beautiful and magnificent city, which has risen within a few years, not only would he be punished criminally, but the captain of the vessel, the officers of the vessel, would be responsible in fines and penalties.

Let us go a little further:

That Chinese persons brought on such vessel shall not be permitted to land, except in case of absolute necessity, and must depart with the vessel on leaving port.

Why, sir, is a Chinaman, one solitary Chinaman, so great a danger as an enemy to our civilization that we can not allow him to see our beautiful cities and ports? This goes far beyond the limits of ordinary law. Let us go a little further:

That if any Chinese person in-bound on such vessel, while the same is within the jurisdiction of the United States, shall escape from such vessel and on its departure shall remain within the United States, such vessel shall be liable to all the penalties herein provided for bringing Chinese into the United States.

Here is a peculiar statute. If a Chinaman should come over in a vessel and against the will of the owners of the vessel, land, and should not return, then the vessel owners are responsible, although they were not guilty even of laches—they are responsible in these severe penalties and the vessel may be confiscated, although the Chinaman's escape may be against the will of the owners of the vessel.

SEC. 3. That the Chinese persons mentioned in section 1 of this act—

That is the diplomatic and consular Chinamen—

as excepted from the provisions of exclusion herein provided shall be admitted to the United States upon the production of the official credentials of such officers and the identification by them of their body and household servants in such manner as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

So that any man in Washington here may go up to the Chinese minister and demand his identification under this proposed law. He may ask the Chinese minister to show him his credentials by which he is permitted to live in this country, and the minister must show them, and those credentials must be prescribed and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury. What is the object of that? Here is a provision aimed alone at these diplomatic and consular officers who must be prepared, when anybody chooses to demand their credentials, to show their right to be here. This, it seems to me, would be insulting them even if they would come here.

Let us go a little further. I do not care about reading all this bill, because it is full of these extreme and harsh measures which are to be resorted to:

SEC. 5. That every vessel whose master shall knowingly violate any of the provisions of this act shall be deemed forfeited to the United States and shall be liable to seizure and condemnation in any district of the United States into which such vessel may enter or in which she may be found.

Here is another:

That any person who shall knowingly bring into or cause to be brought into the United States, by land or otherwise, or who shall aid or abet the same, or aid or abet the landing in the United States from any vessel or otherwise, of any Chinese person not lawfully entitled to enter the United States, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, on conviction thereof, be fined in a sum not exceeding $1,000 and imprisoned for a term not exceeding one year.

I do not think it necessary to read much more of this bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator read the proviso at the top of page 6, at the end of section 8?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury may make such rules and regulations as will allow Chinese, other than Chinese laborers or artisans, to temporarily visit the United States, and, under such rules, and in accordance therewith, but not otherwise, such Chinese may be permitted to temporarily visit the United States; but such right shall never be given to any Chinese laborer or artisan.

That is, a man by securing the proper permit beforehand may temporarily visit the United States; but he can not land without being subject to the penitentiary unless he can in some way get notice to the Secretary of State or the Secretary of the Treasury and obtain a permit to come into our country. This "land of the free and home of the brave" can not allow a person of that character to come in and land upon our shores unless he gets a permit before his coming here, because, forsooth, his civilization would destroy ours, the civilization of 65,000,000 people!

I do not know how our people would get back from China. They have been so long in China that perhaps they have inherited and adopted the habits and customs of the Chinese, and I think they ought to be excluded as well. Here is another provision:

SEC. 14. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent herewith be, and the same are hereby, repealed, and the provisions of all treaties now in force between the United States Government and the Chinese Empire, in so far as they, or any of them, conflict with the provisions of this act, be, and the same are hereby, abrogated, set aside, and repealed: Provided, That nothing contained in this act shall be construed to affect any prosecution or other proceeding, criminal or civil, begun under any existing act, or any acts hereby repealed, but such prosecution or other proceeding, criminal or civil, shall proceed as if this act had not been passed.

Mr. President, I do not deny that the Congress of the United States has full power to repeal a treaty as it has a right to repeal a law, but the reasons for the repeal of a treaty must be apparent and satisfactory to the general judgment of mankind. Any nation which violates unduly and for slight cause a treaty in which it has solemnly engaged would be denounced among the civilized nations of the world. England, for trespassing once or twice in its history upon this sacred ground, gained an epithet which has stuck to it and will stick to it probably for ages to come. No, sir: no nation can violate a treaty except for supreme cause, and we did not do it ten or twelve years ago.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator allow me here in this connection to read article 4 of the treaty of 1880, which is on the line of what the Senator is saying?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly; I was just going to refer to that treaty.

Mr. BUTLER. Article 4 of the treaty of 1880 says:

The high contracting powers having agreed upon the foregoing articles, whenever the Government of the United States shall adopt legislative measures in accordance therewith such measures will be communicated to the Government of China. If the measures as enacted are found to work hardship upon the subjects of China the Chinese minister at Washington may bring the matter to the notice of the Secretary of State of the United States, who will consider the subject with him; and the Chinese foreign office may also bring the matter to the notice of the United States minister at Peking and consider the subject with him, to the end that mutual and unqualified benefit may result.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is our treaty of 1880?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes; in our treaty of 1880, showing what is absolutely necessary before we can pass this restrictive legislation.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I know we did take the utmost care before these laws were originally passed. We gained from the Chinese a concession which probably no other nation would give, that is, a concession that we should exclude all her laboring classes. They have always maintained the position that they were opposed to the emigration of their own countrymen, their own subjects, and they yielded to us the right, before we passed the law of 1882, to exclude certain persons who were deemed unfriendly to our civilization; but, even in spite of that, we went a little beyond what I think was permitted by that treaty.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator allow me right there?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not like these constant interruptions.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator states that the Chinese Government always have been willing that their laborers shall not emigrate to this country; that they do not desire them to come to this country. Why, then, I ask the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, did the Chinese Government hesitate and absolutely refuse, finally, to agree to a treaty which we made here in 1888 for that purpose? A treaty was entered into and was amended in the Senate slightly and sent back to the Chinese Government, but they held it there month after month and month after month, giving us no satisfaction.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am inclined to think that some of the provisions of that treaty of 1888 gave the Chinese offense. They did not refuse to allow us to make a prohibition of the kind of people that we wanted to exclude, but now this bill goes far beyond any proposition ever made before in the Congress of the United States. This attempts to repeal by wholesale rights acquired under existing treaties by the Chinamen who are now here and are supposed to be here under existing treaties. They were either here before immigration was prohibited or they were here in fraud of the law, and when they are here in fraud of the law I do not care what measures are taken to exclude them. I know the difficulty sometimes of identifying them, but most of them are here by virtue of our treaties and in pursuance of our treaties, many of them owning property acquired here in our country.

Mr. President, is it right for us by one fell blow to strike at these treaties? If we do so, we shall get a name among the civilized nations of the earth that we do not deserve. The United States has never until now in its intercourse violated the terms of a treaty so far as I know. I do not think that imputation or charge has ever been made against the American people. Our treaties are like other laws liable to be repealed; yet we have not violated them, and here we propose by wholesale to violate them.

Now, sir, it is the duty of the Committee on Foreign Relations to look to this part of the law especially, because we are compelled constantly, in the negotiation of treaties and in passing upon treaties with all the nations of the world, to see whether the terms we are exacting are reasonable. We require stipulations from them in the clearest terms, and we would enforce those stipulations, cost what it might; but here it is proposed to strike down all these treaties, to banish all these people practically, because they will all have to go, and for what? Because, forsooth, probably 150,000 Chinamen are living in servile labor among 65,000,000 of people, with a certainty that they can not increase under the existing law, and with the actual fact proven that in the only place where we have authentic information they have diminished.

I say if there is ever an occasion for violating a treaty it ought to be for some great cause. When our national life or existence or civilization is in peril; then we may possibly violate a treaty according to international law, because, after all, every nation must decide for itself and its own safety and the preservation of its civilization must be its supreme law. We, therefore, if our territory, our civilization, or our institutions were threatened by any foreign power, would fight to the last gasp.

These Chinamen may not fight with us. They are not a warlike race in the sense that the modern Christian nations are. We do not fear them, but for the very reason that we do not fear their physical power we ought to fear the moral power that they have a right to exercise over our action.

We have made these treaties with them: we have recognized them as among the treaty-making powers of the world. We, with the civilized nations of Europe, forced them into that position, and now, sir, it would be unmanly, it would be unjust, it would be un-American for us to violate those treaties and break them down without stronger cause than we have here to-day.

Mr. President, after making these remarks, I scarcely think it worth while to go into the other branch of this question, the money question, the question of commerce, stated in the telegram read by the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE]. I have had laid upon my table since I commenced speaking, a statement showing that we have imports from China of $19,000,000 worth. There is a trade. You break off all diplomatic and consular relations with those people and that trade will flow into other channels just as sure as fate. There is no doubt about it. Eager rivals would be glad to have us adopt this policy. Great Britain would return us a vote of thanks for transferring to her our commerce with China.

Why have we not this prejudice against the Japanese? They are increasing among us. No objection is made to them. Why is it that we do not have greater restrictions on immigration from all the countries of the world? Because we want their labor; we want them to help develop our industries, our resources. This is a new country, where labor is desired. If, as I verily believe from the discussion we have had, these Chinese laborers are a threat, a danger to our institutions locally wherever they settle, we have already stopped the current of immigration, and there is no danger of it now. Every year, and year by year, it will diminish more and more, until no doubt, under the operation of existing laws and the laws which will be extended by our amendment to this bill, we shall probably get rid of this mass; not a large mass, but this considerable mass of undesirable population, and we probably shall have Chinese of a higher type amongst us, better fitted to represent their people.

I think under the circumstances, therefore, for our honor, for the safety of our people, for the safety of our commerce, and in consideration of the example that we set to other nations, all we ought to do is to continue the policy which has been going on in harmony with the Chinese Government. Let us do what we agreed to do, that is, whenever we propose to pass a law, send the proposed law to the authorities of China and ask them to confer with us about it.

This bill does not deal with American citizens. It deals with Chinese who have no allegiance to our country. We are bound by obligations of honor and duty to pay the same regard to the rights and interests of foreigners who have their homes here amongst us, as to our own people. Why should we rush in here, merely for a barren danger, break down our diplomatic relations, and drive away whatever Chinese we have here among us merely to prevent a possible injury to the Pacific coast for a short time, a danger which has already been averted and turned aside?

Mr. HALE. As the Senator has repeated referred to the value of our diplomatic relations with China as a deterrent from passing any such bill as the House of Representatives has sent us, will the Senator, who is chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, state to the Senate what is the present condition of the diplomatic relations between this country and China?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know of anything except this proposition that would disturb them, nor would I care about communicating it if I did.

Mr. HALE. What is the extent of the diplomatic intercourse between this country and China at the present time—through what ministers are we dealing with China?

Mr. SHERMAN. We have an embassy here from China, a very respected one.

Mr. BUTLER. And we have one in China.

Mr. SHERMAN. We have a minister in China, Mr. Denby. We maintain the same diplomatic and consular relations, I will say, so far as they will allow, with China as we do with the most civilized nations of the world.

During all the time the Chinese legation have been here, it is hardly worth while for me to say that I have never heard that they have done anything whatever in the slightest degree improper or wrong. They are treated everywhere like the other representatives of foreign powers. I think they are respected wherever they are known. They are liberal, I am told also, to charities, and in every respect they are just like the representatives of any other country represented here by a minister.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator say that the present diplomatic relations with China are as complete and as cordial as with other countries where ministers have been sent and accepted?

Mr. SHERMAN. Undoubtedly they are. I know nothing to the contrary, and never have heard of anything.

Mr. President, I again recur to what I think it is proper for the Senate to do. As a matter of course it will do as it pleases. If it is proposed to amend, as the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] proposes to amend this bill, I do not think it is capable of amendment. The foundation of it is wrong. It goes far beyond what I think any Senator would desire to go in his cooler moments. If, therefore, the proposition of the present law, somewhat enlarged and strengthened by provisions adopted as an amendment to this bill, should go to a committee of conference, I have no doubt whatever that if there is anything in the existing order of things that needs especially to be corrected it can be then corrected. For us to waste time upon it in making long arguments or long debate about it, it seems to me would only stir up feeling, create animosity, and probably lead, even before the passage of the bill, to the breaking off of diplomatic relations. I do not say that upon any facts which exist, but I know from the nature of men that there is no nation in the world that would not resent the passage of such a bill. We are aiming this bill at the most powerful, in some respects, certainly the most populous, nation in the world, without cause and without reason.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I do not feel like extending support to the bill now under consideration. I do not believe that in any respect it involves correct doctrines for this nation to follow. We have in times past given some very definite expression in respect of questions involved in the field which this bill covers. In 1868 the Congress of the United States formulated a doctrine which is very decidedly contrary to the one which we find embodied in this bill. In the Fortieth Congress an act was passed, from which I read the following:

Whereas the right of expatriation is a natural and inherent right of all people, indispensable to the enjoyment of the rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; and whereas in the recognition of this principle this Government has freely received emigrants from all nations, and invested them with the rights of citizenship; and whereas it is claimed that such American citizens, with their descendants, are subjects of foreign states, owing allegiance to the governments thereof; and whereas it is necessary to the maintenance of public peace that this claim of foreign allegiance should be promptly and finally disavowed: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That any declaration, instruction, opinion, order, or decision of any officers of this Government which denies, restricts, impairs, or questions the right of expatriation, is hereby declared inconsistent with the fundamental principles of this Government.

That is a very definite declaration of doctrine. Very strenuously does it stand to-day in opposition to the first section of this bill.

What happened next after the passage of that bill? We had in this country at that time an embassy from China. The act from which I have read was approved on the 27th day of July, 1868. On the 28th of July, 1868, the first day after the approval by the President of the act to which I have referred, a treaty was signed between China and the United States, and in that treaty, in article 5, I find this language:

ARTICLE V.

The United States of America and the Emperor of China cordially recognize the inherent and inalienable right of man to change his home and allegiance, and also the mutual advantage of the free migration and emigration of their citizens and subjects respectively from one country to the other for the purposes of curiosity of trade, or as permanent residents. The high contracting parties therefore join in reprobating any other than an entirely voluntary emigration for these purposes. They consequently agree to pass laws making it a penal offense for a citizen of the United States or Chinese subjects to take Chinese subjects either to the United States or to any other foreign country, or for a Chinese subject or citizen of the United States to take citizens of the United States to China or to any other foreign country without their free and voluntary consent, respectively.

That was the doctrine upon which the United States and China stood side by side and hand in hand on the 28th day of July, 1868.

Mr. BUTLER. Was that the first treaty?

Mr. WILSON. Not the first.

Now, what had we been doing prior to the month of July, 1868, from the date of the adoption of our Constitution and the organization of the Government of the United States on down to that day? We had been insisting in the presence of all nations that this doctrine of expatriation should be recognized. Everywhere we presented it; no crowned head in Europe had failed to hear our expression; there was no division of sentiment amongst those who founded our Government. We declared that in express terms in the sentiments uttered by the fathers of the country and by our statesmen, as definitely as this act of 1868 provides, and all the way down that line of march. When we made our appeal to the crowned heads of Europe they said, "Oh, no, once a subject, always a subject; we can not recognize any such doctrine as that." No country recognized it until 1868, when the Emperor of China, through his embassy here, extended his hand and said "Yes, I will agree," and this Government grasped his hand warmly and gave him the thanks of the Republic of the United States, because in the whole line of nations he was the first to approve of our doctrine.

Now, what have we done? The first one of the nations consenting to our doctrine and embodying it in treaties was the first one we picked out to slap in the face as the march went on.

It is not, in my judgment, in accordance with the true dignity of a great nation to do this, and, therefore, I feel to-day as I felt when the Scott bill was pending in the Senate that it was my duty to vote against it, as I shall vote against this bill.

Mr. President, I do not wish to occupy the time of the Senate in much discussion, but it seems to me that if the members of this body—and if they will not do it, the people, not only of this country but of others will—compare that act of 1868 with the first section of this bill, and if it were possible for any human mind to devise a more direct opposite of that declaration of ours of 1868 than this first section presents, I have never discovered it.

"The right of expatriation is a natural and inherent right of all people." Now, it is said as the bill comes to us from the House:

That from and after the passage of this act it shall be unlawful for any Chinese person or persons, whether subjects of the Chinese Empire or otherwise, as well as those who are now within the limits of the United States, and who may hereafter leave the United States and attempt to return as those who have never been here, or having been here, have departed from the United States (save and accepting only the following classes, that is to say, such Chinese person or persons as may be duly accredited to the Government of the United States as ministers plenipotentiary or other diplomatic representatives, consuls-general, consular and commercial agents, including other officers of the Chinese or other governments traveling upon the business of that Government, with their body and household servants), to come to or within, or to land at any port or place within the United States; and the coming of Chinese persons to the United States, whether for the purpose of transit only or otherwise, excepting the classes hereinbefore specifically described and excepted from and after the passage of this act, be, and the same is hereby absolutely prohibited.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. WILSON. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator has talked about the inalienable right of expatriation, and has read from a treaty entered into between the Chinese Government and this Government in 1868, I think it was.

Mr. WILSON. Yes.

Mr. MITCHELL. Is it not a fact, and will he not admit it to be true, that by the treaty the Chinese Government entered into with the United States in 1880 the Chinese Government waived that right and consented that the United States might enact laws in direct contravention to the doctrine of expatriation being an inalienable right?

Mr. WILSON. I recognize that fact, and yet I think, if it had not been for the breach of faith which this Government manifested in its intercourse with China, China never would have consented to any such thing being done. It was because we were not true to the doctrines which we had proclaimed and stood by from the organization of the Government down to 1868, that China was willing to make some other kind of arrangement.

Mr. President, while there may be a great many unpleasant things and inconveniences growing out of Chinese immigration to this country, so there are in respect of other classes of immigrants.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to put to the Senator an interrogatory. I ask if our representatives who made that treaty with the Chinese Government did not declare to the Chinese representatives that their only purpose was to be authorized to exclude improper persons of particular classes and nothing more?

Mr. MITCHELL. It related to laborers by name.

Mr. DAWES. Did they not declare that it was their purpose and that the United States would never go further than to legislate against bad men of particular classes?

Mr. MITCHELL. Here is just what they did, if the Senator will allow me.

Mr. DAWES. I am not asking what they did; I am asking what they represented to the commissioners on the part of China. I know what they did, and I know what we did immediately after we got that treaty. Put the two side by side, and if there is anything in the English language which contradicts itself, it is that.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator would not have the Chinese Government go back on their final agreement, whatever they may have said in negotiating that agreement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] is entitled to the floor. Does he yield?

Mr. MITCHELL. If the Senator will allow me, we shall see what they did agree to.

Mr. DAWES. I am not disputing about what they did, but they agreed to it upon assurances which were given them.

Mr. WILSON. I believe I am entitled to the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators will please address the Chair and proceed only after being recognized by the Chair. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. WILSON. Not at present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa declines to yield.

Mr. WILSON. I can not yield at present for the reason that I think I can conclude my remarks in less time than the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Oregon can get through with their colloquy.

Mr. MITCHELL. All right.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I have only one request to make in concluding the few remarks I shall make on this subject, and that is, for Senators who think we should pass this bill to take that first section of it and then to take the act of July 27, 1868, and as a third part the article of the treaty between China and the United States, which I have read, and place them at the head of their beds and go down to sleep and dream about them, and see whether in that triangle of governmental purposes and declarations they can find anything which will make them feel entirely satisfied with a vote in favor of the passage of a law containing the first section of this bill.

Mr. FELTON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator one question before he takes his seat. Admitting this inherent right in mankind to go wherever they please, whether they are desired or not, what consistency was there in this Government passing a law against contract labor? What right had we to pass that law against honest and expert men who wanted to come here and make their living?

Mr. WILSON. Was the Senator from California in favor of the passage of that law?

Mr. FELTON. Most assuredly I was.

Mr. WILSON. Doubtless, then, the Senator has better reasons than I could give him why that law was passed. I think we have done a great many things in the way of legislation which we might have put in better condition and better shape than we did.

Mr. FELTON. The Senator may be right, but it strikes me that the power to prevent the admission of objectionable people to this country is as inalienable and inviolable as my right to protect my life and property. These inherent rights depend a good deal upon the surrounding conditions.

Mr. WILSON. The Senator forgets the difference between the cases. In the case to which he refers we were regulating the incoming of Chinese, and in order to formulate some conditions for the protection of our society which we thought were proper, and where the condition of persons proposing to come in was such that we could exclude them without any violation of principle, we declared the power to exclude those, as when a man does wrong, when one of our own citizens does something which he should not have done, if it does not amount to a crime which may put him in the penitentiary or the jail, or impose a fine upon him, a great many of our citizens would be very apt to shun him, and not give him that countenance in society which he had received before. That is a matter of regulation and this is a matter of utter exclusion. That is the difference.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I do not know that I care about detaining the Senate at this late time of the day except to call attention to a few of the provisions of this bill, and in that connection to call attention to the provisions of the treaty which this Government entered into with the Chinese Government. I should like however to read article 1 of the treaty in connection with the last three lines of the first section of this bill from the House. The bill reads:

And the coming of Chinese persons to the United States, whether for the purpose of transit only or otherwise, excepting the classes hereinbefore specifically described and excepted, from and after the passage of this act, be, and the same is hereby, absolutely prohibited.

Now, I wish to read the treaty of 1880 in connection with that provision in this bill:

ARTICLE I.

Whenever in the opinion of the Government of the United States the coming of Chinese laborers to the United States, or their residence therein, affects, or threatens to affect, the interests of that country, or to endanger the good order of the said country or of any locality within the territory thereof, the Government of China agrees that the Government of the United States may regulate, limit, or suspend such coming or residence, but may not absolutely prohibit it. The limitation or suspension shall be reasonable and shall apply only to Chinese who may go to the United States as laborers, other classes not being included in the limitations. Legislation taken in regard to Chinese laborers will be of such a character only as is necessary to enforce the regulation, limitation, or suspension of immigration, and immigrants shall not be subject to personal maltreatment or abuse.

That is the first article.

ARTICLE II.

Chinese subjects, whether proceeding to the United States as teachers, students, merchants, or from curiosity, together with their body and household servants, and Chinese laborers who are now in the United States, shall be allowed to go and come of their own free will and accord, and shall be accorded all the rights, privileges, immunities, and exemptions which are accorded to the citizens and subjects of the most favored nation.

ARTICLE III.

If Chinese laborers, or Chinese of any other class, now either permanently or temporarily residing in the territory of the United States, meet with ill treatment at the hands of any other persons, the Government of the United States will exert all its power to devise measures for their protection and to secure to them the same rights, privileges, immunities, and exemptions as may be enjoyed by the citizens or subjects of the most favored nation, and to which they are entitled by treaty.

Article 4, which I read while the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] was on the floor, provides:

The high contracting powers having agreed upon the foregoing articles, whenever the Government of the United States shall adopt legislative measures in accordance therewith, such measures will be communicated to the Government of China. If the measures as enacted are found to work hardship upon the subjects of China, the Chinese minister at Washington may bring the matter to the notice of the Secretary of State of the United States, who will consider the subject with him; and the Chinese foreign office may also bring the matter to the notice of the United States minister at Peking, and consider the subject with him, to the end that mutual and unqualified benefit may result.

In faith whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed and sealed the foregoing at Peking, in English and Chinese, being three originals of each text of even tenor and date, the ratifications of which shall be exchanged at Peking within one year from date of its execution.

Mr. President, there is a solemn treaty between the Government of the United States and the Chinese Government. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] stated awhile ago, I believe, that the act of 1888, known as the Scott act, had abrogated that treaty, and he rather advanced that fact as an argument in favor of the passage of this bill as it came from the House, this bill equally abrogating the treaty which I have just read.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator has read the treaty now and, as I understand, he objects to the text of the House bill because it is in contravention of the terms of the treaty, which I admit it is. Does the Senator hold that the act of October 1, 1888, known as the Scott exclusion act, is not in contravention of any of the sections he has just read?

Mr. BUTLER. I was just coming to that. I think it is.

Mr. MITCHELL. There can not be any question about that.

Mr. BUTLER. I have no question about that, and I think the passage of that act in the light of what has occurred since was a disgrace to the Congress of the United States.

Mr. MITCHELL. But the honorable Senator from South Carolina is a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations—

Mr. BUTLER. I was not at that time. I am now.

Mr. MITCHELL. I understand the Senator is giving his support to the proposed amendment of that committee for the House bill, which extends the Scott exclusion act for ten years.

Mr. BUTLER. No, but it extends the act of 1882.

Mr. MITCHELL. It extends all acts, the act of October 1, 1888, just as much as the others.

Mr. BUTLER. So much the worse for it. In view of the fact that the Senator has called my attention to it, I think I shall vote against the substitute.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think the Senator will have to do so in order to be consistent.

Mr. BUTLER. The substitute is harsh enough, but the bill as it comes from the House I say, and say with all respect to those who have been instrumental in its passage, is a disgrace to this country. That is my deliberate judgment. Here we are inviting the Chinese people to engage in commercial intercourse with us by every possible means known to civilized people, and yet we turn in the very teeth of it and insult them by the passage of an act like this.

Why, Mr. President, I have never heard, I have never known in a civilized country such a proceeding as this which we propose. I should regret such a course on the part of this Government in dealing with these people, who, the Senator from Ohio said so properly, are not a warlike people, but they are at least entitled to some consideration at our hands. Time and again they have yielded to the exactions and the demands of this Government with regard to their own people.

The Burlingame treaty, I believe, was agreed to in 1868, and our country at that time regarded it, as I have no doubt it was, as the greatest diplomatic triumph of modern times. This country had been the first to induce the Chinese people to break down their wall of exclusion and to admit foreigners among them. We all remember with what triumph Mr. Burlingame returned from China with his Chinese companions and what a great triumph in diplomacy it was regarded. We have gone on from time to time, as has been pointed out by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON], announcing the doctrine upon which this Government could and would stand, and yet in response to a demand from a very limited area of this country, the Pacific coast, we are proposing now by the passage of this bill to throw insult into the face of these people and to violate every treaty stipulation which we have ever made with them. If, as the Senator from Oregon has stated, we did that in the act of 1888, I for one, sir, am ready to call a halt in that disgraceful proceeding.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will say—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. BUTLER. Of course I yield.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will call attention to the precise point I make. In article 2 of the treaty it is provided, among other things, as follows:

And Chinese laborers who are now in the United States shall be allowed to go and come of their own free will and accord, and shall be accorded all the rights, privileges, immunities, and exemptions which are accorded to the citizens and subjects of the most favored nation.

That is the treaty. The Scott exclusion act says this:

That from and after the passage of this act, it shall be unlawful for any Chinese laborer who shall at any time heretofore have been, or who may now or hereafter be, a resident within the United States, and who shall have departed, or shall depart therefrom, and shall not have returned before the passage of this act, to return to, or remain in, the United States.

Mr. BUTLER. Precisely, Mr. President. So much the worse, as I stated awhile ago. I have regretted a dozen times that I voted for what is known as the Scott act, but I am not going to perpetrate the same folly by voting for this bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator did not vote for the law, but he took occasion to show the fact, by inquiries of the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Oregon, that the Scott act was a violation of the treaty. Having shown that fact, the Senator stated that he was willing to go as far as any other Senator in excluding the Chinese, and that he would vote for the bill, although it was in violation of the treaty. When the vote was taken the Senator was absent, and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] announced his pair, but the Senator from South Carolina took occasion to declare the fact that the act of 1888 was a deliberate violation of the treaty.

Now, then, the treaty having been broken in that way by an act of Congress which passed the Senate once, although no quorum voted, without a vote in the negative, and at last with only three votes in the negative, it has seemed to me, with all due deference to the Senator from Ohio, that if additional legislation is wanted Congress ought not necessarily to refrain from adopting it because the treaty may be thereby violated. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] asks me who the three were.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President—

Mr. CHANDLER. One is the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON], another is the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] who has just risen, and the other was the Senator from Georgia, Mr. Brown. I am not certain whether other Senators were paired against the bill or not, but on the day when there was no quorum the vote was 37 to none, and on the day when it was passed the vote was 37 to 2.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow me to make one remark? While there were seven wise men in Greece, there seemed to be only three in the Senate at that time. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTLER. I am much obliged to the Senator from New Hampshire for calling my attention to what I did say. I now recall it. I had forgotten whether I had voted on the bill or not, but if I had voted for it I should have felt very much ashamed of it, I can say with perfect frankness.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator allow me to read what he said?

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator has stated it substantially. I have no objection to the Senator reading what I said, but I think he has stated it substantially.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator says he regrets the violation of the treaty, that he votes for the bill with regret, but he should vote for it. The Senator will allow me again to say that the Committee on Foreign Relations report a bill extending the law which violated a treaty, and yet say to us we must not amend the House bill because it will be violating the treaty.

Mr. BUTLER. Two wrongs do not make a right. I will say very frankly to the Senator from New Hampshire that if I had voted for that bill violating the treaty I should have felt very much ashamed of it. I am very much ashamed of having stated what I did say in regard to it, because I think it was wholly unjustifiable.

But returning to the pending bill, in addition to what was said by the Senator from Ohio I want to call attention to section 11, which provides:

That the collector of customs of the port where any vessels arrive having Chinese persons aboard who are seeking admission to the United States shall determine who are and who are not Chinese, and his decision may be reviewed by the Secretary of the Treasury, and not otherwise. Said collector shall have the right to administer oaths and take and hear testimony, and pending such investigation by such collector such person shall remain on board the ship bringing such person to the United States.

Now, here is what I want to call special attention to:

When the writ of habeas corpus is issued to determine the right of any Chinese person to land in the United States whose right to land has been decided adverse to such Chinese person by any collector of customs, pending the hearing of such petitions and until the final determination of such proceeding, the persons in whose behalf such writ was issued shall remain in the custody of the United States collector of customs, and shall not be admitted to bail, and if before the decision in the proceeding the vessel upon which such Chinese person arrived departs from the United States, and the proceeding is determined against such petitioner's right to land, such Chinese person shall be returned to China after such determination.

SEC. 12. That it shall be the duty of all Chinese persons within the limits of the United States at the time of the passage of this act to apply to the commissioner of internal revenue of their respective districts within one year after the passage of this act for a certificate of residence, and any Chinese person within the limits of the United States who shall fail or refuse to comply with the provisions of this act, or who, within one year after the passage hereof, shall be found without such certificate of residence, shall be adjudged by the court before whom he may be brought as being unlawfully within the limits of the United States and subject to the same fines and penalties as though he had unlawfully come into the United States in the first instance.

Then in section 13 the bill provides that—

The certificate shall contain a true photographic copy of the applicant, together with his name, age, local residence, and occupation, and a duplicate of the same shall be filed in the office of the commissioner of internal revenue of the district within which such Chinaman makes application. On making application for such certificate the applicant shall pay to the commissioner of internal revenue of the district within which such Chinaman makes application the sum of $3 for such certificates. The fee collected under the provisions of this act shall be paid to the Treasurer of the United States and shall be set apart and be known as the "Chinese certificate fund," and shall be used to defray all the expenses of enforcing this act.

Mr. FELTON. Will the Senator allow me to make a remark?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. FELTON. I desire to say for the information of the Senate that I do not know of any Senator here who favors that bill as it stands. There have been some amendments submitted by the Senator from New Hampshire and others that will entirely cure many of the objections which lie against the bill. For instance, in the matter of the entire exclusion the amendment is before us already to make that a term of fifteen years. The time is immaterial, so far as that is concerned. The only desire which controls us in the whole bill and amendments is simply to prevent the coming of those people under the present laws into the United States; that is all.

Mr. BUTLER. It seems to me that the present laws are stringent enough, as has just been pointed out by the Senator from New Hampshire and the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. FELTON. But they are not effective.

Mr. BUTLER. Then what earthly use is there in our passing at every session of Congress, or at every other session, or as often as we please, acts which can not be enforced?

I can not understand that that justifies us in proceeding to violate the treaty obligations between this Government and another, as section 14 of the bill does. The amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire I do not understand cures that difficulty. Perhaps gentlemen of larger experience than mine may remember instances, but I have never known where a treaty between two great powers has been terminated without some notice on the one side or the other.

I believe in diplomatic circles and in the intercourse between great nations, or nations that are not great, the usual courtesies—I might say decencies—that exist between civilized countries should be observed in the termination of a solemn treaty. Yet we propose to do that by an act of Congress without consulting the other party to the treaty.

I trust, Mr. President, that this bill will not receive the sanction of the Senate of the United States and add to the very unsatisfactory condition which this Government occupies to the Chinese Government.

Mr. CHANDLER obtained the floor.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have been conferring with some Senators, and I will ask if there can be unanimous consent to take a vote upon this measure at 5 o'clock to-morrow evening. I should like the Chair to ask for the unanimous consent of the Senate to take the vote to-morrow evening at 5 o'clock, and in the mean time we can proceed to the consideration of the bill immediately after the morning business to-morrow, so as to give Senators full opportunity to be heard.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio asks the unanimous consent of the Senate that the bill be taken up to-morrow after the conclusion of the routine morning business, and that the vote be taken upon it at 5 o'clock to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. HARRIS. What is the necessity for depriving the morning hour of the time that is usually devoted to the Calendar under Rule VIII?

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to let it be taken up at 2 o'clock.

Mr. HARRIS. After 2 o'clock I have no objection.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to ask the Senate to take up to-morrow morning after the routine business a bill which is not yet quite reached on the Calendar. It is about the middle of the eighth page, and we are about the beginning of the sixth. It is the bill for the relief of the College of William and Mary, in Virginia. I made the report on that subject when I was a member of the other House, and I take an interest in it. I shall leave town Monday afternoon, so that either to-morrow or Monday is the only time it can be taken up when I shall be present.

Mr. MORGAN. I hope that will be done, because the Senator from Massachusetts knows more of that question, I think, than any other member of this body, and it will not lead to any debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will first dispose of the pending request, which is the request of the Senator from Ohio that the Chinese exclusion bill shall come up as the unfinished business at 2 o'clock, and be proceeded with after 2 o'clock to-morrow, and that the vote be taken on the bill at 5 o'clock to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. CALL. I object.

Mr. CHANDLER. Before consent is given I want to understand whether it may appear that we shall have from 2 to 5 o'clock for debate.

Mr. MORGAN. The proposition is objected to. The Senator from Florida objects.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. CALL. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida objects to unanimous consent.

Mr. SHERMAN. All right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks the unanimous consent of the Senate—

Mr. HOAR. I did not mean to ask that consent now, but I should like to give notice that to-morrow, immediately after the routine business, I shall ask unanimous consent, if there is no objection, that the bill for the relief of the College of William and Mary may be taken up.

Mr. CALL. I understood that it is the Chinese exclusion bill for which unanimous consent was asked.

Mr. HOAR. That of course will come up at 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts ask for unanimous consent?

Mr. HOAR. I will do so now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks the unanimous consent of the Senate that the bill (S. 2566) for the relief of William and Mary College of Virginia, being Order of Business 449 upon the Calendar, be considered by the Senate at the close of the morning business to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. SANDERS. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Massachusetts if this is a personal accommodation to him. Does he contemplate being absent from Washington, and therefore ask that the bill be considered to-morrow?

Mr. HOAR. I expect to ask a leave of absence for the rest of the session, and to depart from Washington next Monday at 3 o'clock, so that if we do not sit on Saturday, to-morrow will be the only time we can take up the bill with any prospect of my dealing with it.

Mr. SANDERS. I certainly do not think anyone will object under those circumstances.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. FELTON. I should like to know for information what condition that would leave the pending measure in?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending measure comes up at 2 o'clock as the unfinished business, and its consideration will be continued after that time.

Mr. FELTON. If unanimous consent is given for the consideration of Senate bill 2566, and it is not concluded at 2 o'clock, what is the result?

Mr. HOAR. It does not interfere with the pending bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does not interfere with the unfinished business in the least. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] is entitled to the floor on the pending bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. I yield to the Senator from Montana [Mr. SANDERS].

Mr. SANDERS. In making this agreement I trust that we shall be able to dispose of that matter and also of this, complying with the request of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations as well as with the request of the Senator from Massachusetts. It is advanced here as a legal opinion that two weeks from to-day there is no legislation excluding this class of people from the United States, and it is important either that that matter shall be determined as not being a proper interpretation of the law or that new legislation be had.

In my own view, and that is all I desire to say on the subject, the existing legislation continues until 1894, but I think there ought not to be an uncertainty hanging over the country in that respect, and it ought to be made certain.

Mr. SHERMAN. If this matter is not disposed of to-morrow evening within a reasonable time for adjournment, I give notice now that I shall try to-morrow, if I can, to get a session on Saturday to close it. I think it is important to dispose of the matter and leave no doubt about the construction of an act of Congress.

Mr. CHANDLER. I thought the understanding was that we were to vote at 5 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Florida objected, and it goes over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will the Senator yield to a motion to adjourn?

Mr. CHANDLER. Very well.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from New Hampshire has the floor, and I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire being recognized on the pending bill, the Senator from Ohio moves that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, April 22, 1892, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, April 21, 1892.

CLAIMS ARISING UNDER THE ACT OF JULY 4, 1864.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a list of claims arising under the act of July 4, 1864, examined and allowed since February 7, 1891; which, with accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of the court in the case of L. D. Allen vs. The United States; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

BRIG BETSEY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of the court in the French spoliation claims arising out of the seizure of the vessel, brig Betsey; which was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

SENATE BILLS AND CONCURRENT RESOLUTIONS REFERRED.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following Senate bills; which were read a first and second time, referred to the committees indicated below, and ordered to be printed:

A bill (S. 1615) to facilitate the disposition of causes in the Court of Claims—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A bill (S. 2460) to repeal the license tax of $25 per year now imposed upon produce dealers in the markets of the District of Columbia—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

A bill (S. 1185) to establish a court of appeals for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, the following Senate concurrent resolutions:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That 2,000 copies of the list of Congressional documents prepared by the superintendent of documents, Department of the Interior, be printed and delivered to that officer, of which he shall supply 2 copies to each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in Congress, and the remainder shall be distributed to public and other libraries—

to the Committee on Printing.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring therein), That 5,000 copies, comprising the necessary texts, tables, and charts, be printed of the paper entitled "Certain Climatic Features of the Two Dakotas," being a presentation of special information collected by the Weather Bureau for a long series of years as to temperature, rainfall, winds, barometric pressures, evaporation, and atmospheric disturbances, which are believed to have marked influence upon agricultural interests in the said States.

Sec. 2. That 1,000 copies be for the use of the Senate, 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 2,000 copies to be distributed by the Weather Bureau—to the Committee on Printing.

APPOINTMENT OF CONFEREES.

The SPEAKER announced as conferees on the bill (H. R. 5499) to amend an act entitled "An act approving with amendments the funding act of Arizona," approved June 25, 1890, Mr. WASHINGTON, Mr. KILGORE, and Mr. PERKINS.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. HERBERT, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. HARTER, four days, on account of important business.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. O'FERRALL. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order, the further consideration of the case of Noyes against Rockwell.

Mr. CLANCY. I ask the gentleman to give way to me for about three minutes.

Mr. O'FERRALL. Will you withdraw the bill if it leads to debate?

Mr. CLANCY. If there is any debate I will withdraw it.

WILLIAM F. C. NINDEMANN.

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 7281) granting a pension to William F. C. Nindemann, late of the Jeannette expedition to the Arctic Ocean.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension rolls, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William F. Nindemann, late of the United States ship Jeannette, in the expedition to the Arctic Ocean.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLAND. I would like to have some explanation of it. I would like to know what the bill will carry.

Mr. CLANCY. The bill does not carry anything. The matter will be referred to the Pension Office, so that this man may be pensioned under the law.

Mr. BLAND. What would the pension be under the law?

Mr. CLANCY. Possibly about $10 a month.

Mr. BLAND. Possibly; but probably more.

Mr. CLANCY. He was a sailor in the Jeannette, and as he did not rate as an officer, he can not have a large pension.

Mr. BLAND. I would like to have the report read at any rate. I do not like to see these bills passed without knowing anything about them.

Mr. O'FERRALL. I will have to demand the regular order.

Mr. CLANCY. Wait a minute; it will not take but a minute now.

The report was read at length for information.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. McMILLIN. I did not catch the reading of the report, and I would like to ask the gentleman if this man was in the military service?

Mr. CLANCY. He was in the naval service.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BUTLER. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask one or two questions. Has this bill been through the Committee of the Whole on a Friday night session?

Mr. CLANCY. It can not be reached; it is a case of special urgency.

Mr. BUTLER. Has it been reported by the Committee on Pensions?

Mr. CLANCY. It has been reported for a long time.

Mr. BUTLER. I think it will have to take its chance on a Friday night session; and I will have to object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. CLANCY. I ask the gentleman to withdraw his objection.

UNITED STATES AND BRAZIL STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a set of resolutions passed by the Memphis Merchants' Exchange be printed in the RECORD. These resolutions are in the form of a protest from the Merchants' Exchange against the action of the United States and Brazil Steamship Company, at present, as I am informed, a subsidized line, which refuses to receive coffee in Brazil destined for delivery at the port of Newport News, in Virginia.

I do not wish to occupy the time of the House in making any extended remarks at this time. I do wish to have the resolutions printed in full in the RECORD for information. In this way I can bring to the attention of the House and of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce a matter of very great, and I might well say vital, importance to the people of the South and Southwest. If the allegation contained is true a great steamship company, for some reason which does not appear, but which can be readily imagined, is discriminating in favor of one port as against another. I am informed that prior to a recent date this steamship company has been receiving coffee in Brazil destined for interior points in the United States, on a through bill of lading, and landing the consignment at Newport News at the same rate of freight charged for delivering it at New York City. The steamship company, although its vessels touch at Newport News just the same as formerly, has refused to land consignments of coffee at any port except New York. This is exceedingly unjust. Some legislation is necessary, and if this line is receiving a subsidy under any contract made or about to be made by the Postmaster-General under recent law, that subsidy ought to be withheld unless the steamship company will treat all shippers and all ports alike. I intend to introduce a bill on the subject to-day, and hope no objection will be made to printing the resolutions in the RECORD in full.

Mr. BURROWS. Why was it necessary to cumber the RECORD with them?

Mr. WASHINGTON. They are very brief.

Mr. REED. As if anything could cumber the RECORD! [Laughter.]

Mr. BURROWS. Let them be referred to the committee.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the objection which I made a moment ago to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CLANCY].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa withdraws his objection to the pension bill called up by the gentlemen from New York. Is there further objection?

Mr. SNODGRASS. I object.

Mr. O'FERRALL. Now, Mr. Speaker, I yield for a moment—

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Virginia that he can not yield the floor. If he withdraws the contested-election case, then the Chair will exercise the right of recognition.

Mr. O'FERRALL. Then I demand the regular order, unless the House will indulge the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JOHNSON] for a moment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

LEAVE TO SIT DURING SESSIONS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. JOHNSON of Ohio. To ask the consent of the House that the committee investigating the assessments of the District of Columbia be permitted to sit during the sessions of the House.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. O'FERRALL. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that gentlemen having reports of committees to submit may hand them to the Clerk.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SNODGRASS] withdraws his objection to the pension bill I have called up.

Mr. O'FERRALL. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. O'FERRALL] calls up the contested-election case of Noyes vs. Rockwell. The Clerk will read the resolutions.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Hosea H. Rockwell was not elected a Representative to the Fifty-second Congress from the Twenty-eighth Congressional district of New York and is not entitled to the seat.

Resolved, That Henry T. Noyes was elected a Representative to the Fifty-second Congress from the Twenty-eighth Congressional district of New York and is entitled to the seat.

Mr. DEFOREST. Mr. Speaker,

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Speaker, the objection to the pension bill which I called up is withdrawn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not again submit the request of the gentleman from New York unless the contested-election case is withdrawn.

Mr. CLANCY. It is not a question of submitting it again, Mr. Speaker; the objection is withdrawn.

The SPEAKER. If the gentlemen from Virginia withdraws the contested-election case, then the Chair must recognize the right of recognition himself.

Mr. O'FERRALL. I do not withdraw it, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DEFOREST] is recognized.

Mr. DE FOREST. Mr. Speaker, I was going to say that if there was no objection I would yield a few moments of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CLANCY] for the consideration of his bill.

The SPEAKER. The bill could not be considered in the time of the gentleman from Connecticut when he is recognized for debate upon the contested-election case.

Mr. DE FOREST. Mr. Speaker, constrained as I feel myself to be from a sense of duty to vote in favor of the resolution recommended by the majority of the committee, and thus in favor of unseating a Democratic member of this House with whom we have been pleasantly associated from the beginning of the session, I desire to avail myself of the opportunity extended to me by the courtesy of the chairman of the committee very briefly to explain my reasons for so doing.

It seems to be conceded, sir, upon all hands that the proper rule for our guidance in the disposition of questions of this character is the law of the State where the election was held out of which the controversy has arisen.

The privilege which we enjoy under the Constitution to act as judges of the qualifications and election returns of our own members is not an arbitrary privilege to be exercised by us capriciously or under the dictation of party prejudice or personal preference, but a solemn duty, to be performed conscientiously and deliberately, under a sense of the obligation of the official oath that we have taken and in accordance with certain well-defined principles and precepts of justice; a duty, sir, as judges upon the bench; as jurors in the box, to determine those qualifications and election returns in accordance with the law of the land; and that law, except so far as it is prescribed by the Constitution of the United States and acts of Congress passed in pursuance thereof, is the law of the State, the people of which have elected the member to come here as their representative.

This being the principle by which we are to be guided, the first question which presents itself for our consideration and determination here is: To whom did the certificate of election in this case lawfully belong? That arises here strictly as a preliminary question. It would not ordinarily be so. Ordinarily it would be conceded that the certificate of election raised a prima facie title in the holder which it was incumbent upon the contestant to overthrow by affirmative proof. But in this case circumstances have been called to the attention of the Committee on Elections and by that committee have been investigated and reported to this House, which make it our duty to go behind the face of the certificate and to ask whether or not the certificate was properly granted and to whom, under the laws of the State of New York, it justly belonged. And, sir, it is impossible to resist the conclusion that the certificate was improperly granted, and that it ought to have been awarded to the contestant in this case, and not to the contestee.

The reasons for this conclusion have been amply explained in the arguments of gentlemen who have preceded me. They are fully elaborated and illustrated in the report submitted by the majority of this committee. It is not necessary now to recapitulate those reasons. Suffice it to say that the courts of the State of New York have so decided—the special term of the supreme court of the State; then, on appeal, the general term of the supreme court of the State; again, on appeal, the court of appeals of the State, the court of last resort, the final expounder and determiner of that law by which we all agree that we are bound, have all declared that the returns made out on the night of the election, at the time that the law required them to be made out, are the only proper basis of the canvass. These returns—that canvass predicated on these returns—gave the election to the contestant, Mr. Noyes. To him, therefore, by the decision of the courts of the State of New York, the certificate of election should have been awarded.

I take it, Mr. Speaker, therefore, to be our bounden duty to treat the parties to this contest precisely as though that had been done which by the law of the State of New York ought to have been done. I take it to be our duty to treat them as though the certificate had been issued to and was held by the contestant, Mr. Noyes, instead of the contestee, and as though the seat had been awarded to and were now occupied by him, and as though the contestee were here asserting and offering to prove and bound to prove that the returns are wrong, and that he and not the present contestant was lawfully elected and entitled to the seat.

Such being the situation, then, what has been done? The face of the returns gives a plurality of 16 votes to the contestant, Mr. Noyes. The Committee on Contested Elections of this House, by additions and deductions about which there is no dispute now, have reduced that plurality to 6. There it stands, and, sir, there is no serious attempt made, as I regard the record and papers in this case—there is no serious demand made to overturn that plurality in favor of Mr. Noyes, except by virtue of what are termed the "Doyle" ballots. I say no serious attempt. No other attempt is hinted at in the report of the minority of the committee submitted in support of their views in this case.

The learned gentleman from Alabama [Mr. COBB], who yesterday expounded the views of the minority, said that when the report was prepared they never contemplated any such attempt. It seems to me that the learned gentleman from Alabama must be mistaken when he says this change of mind is due to some new discovery in connection with the case, for we know that when that minority report was made up all of the evidence in the case had been read, considered, and passed upon by the committee. No other facts can properly be considered here. Are we to believe that the sagacious gentleman from Alabama, in the examination of all of these facts, did not discover the ground to which since that report has been made and submitted and since the debate on this question has begun he has seen fit to shift his position.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. DE FOREST. Certainly.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. You must remember that I was not present in the committee when that discussion was had on this question, and you must remember further that I have not shifted my position at all. I still hold that the "Doyle ballots" ought to go out. But my contention is that even if they do not go out, Mr. Rockwell still on the other ground would be entitled to the seat.

Mr. DE FOREST. Mr. Speaker, I had supposed that the gentleman had taken part in the consideration of the case in the committee, the result of which he seems so much interested in. I had supposed when he expounded the views of the minority in this case so ably, he was talking of transactions in which he had been personally engaged. When he said that such and such things appeared in the course of the investigation which are not stated in the record or report; when he says such and such things do not appear, which gentlemen on the other side claim, I supposed he was talking from personal observation and knowledge. But it appears from what the gentleman now says that he was not so far present during the progress of the case as to ascertain the essential facts, which are now deemed material and which ought to have been known to him.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Let me say further that so far as I know and believe, there was no analysis of the record attempted in the committee.

Mr. DE FOREST. It seems to me—and I am not here, of course, to dispute the honorable gentleman, and would not for the world call in question anything that he says—but it seems to me, looking at all the papers in the case, that when the minority report was made and submitted to the House, the ground which is now taken by the gentleman was abandoned, and that abandonment was for obviously good reasons—for the reason that the gentleman saw it was untenable and unreliable in his view of the case.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. The gentleman, I trust, will do me justice. He will find nothing in my remarks of yesterday abandoning the position at all.

Mr. DE FOREST. Very well; let any gentleman read the report of the minority and see whether he can find anything which hints at the claim made yesterday that this second count is to be relied on as evidence of the true state of the vote. On the contrary, such a view is distinctly disavowed. The minority report declares that the principal question is in regard to the Doyle ballots. If that so-called second count were relied on there would be no necessity whatever for the contestee bringing the question of the Doyle ballots to the attention of the House, for he would be elected without reference to them. The minority report says that the principal contention is in regard to the Doyle ballots. It starts out with the hypothesis that Mr. Noyes is entitled to the plurality of 16, which the face of the returns gives him, and he goes on to reduce that plurality; and in order to accomplish that purpose it brings in the matter of the Doyle ballots as a necessary factor.

I say it seems to me that when the minority report was made out the learned gentlemen who made it realized the insurmountable difficulties that lay in the way of the claim now made in regard to that second count—the impossibility of this House of Representatives with any respect for itself taking into consideration or giving any weight at all in the scales of justice between these parties to that so-called second count; a count made at a time when the law did not allow it to be made; a count of ballots which the law did not allow to be counted and which in the mean time had been open to public interference; a count of ballots a portion of which the proof shows had been tampered with; a count made by inspection officers acting not by their full number in any case—in some cases by three out of five, in some cases by two out of five, in some cases by three out of five a part of the time, and two out of five a part of the time—an incomplete count that did not take into consideration all the territory where the omissions occurred; a count made after a lapse of sufficient time to ascertain what the result had been in that entire Congressional district, and how necessary it was to effect a change in this particular locality in order to affect the entire result; a count which resulted in a change of just about votes enough to overturn the result in that entire Congressional district.

Mr. O'FERRALL. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order. There is too much confusion in the Hall.

The SPEAKER. The House will please be in order.

Mr. O'FERRALL. I do not like to make the charge, but it seems to me there are some gentlemen on this floor who whenever any member is addressing the Chair in favor of the ma-majority report endeavor to divert attention from such remarks by confusion and disorder.

The SPEAKER. The House will please be in order.

Mr. DE FOREST. I say it is impossible for this House, with any respect for itself, or with any respect for the rights of the parties, to entertain for a single moment that so-called count as evidence of the correct state of the vote.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. He stated that all these counts, the result of which was written on the back of the ballots, were made a day or two after the election.

Mr. DE FOREST. I do not know that I did.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I think you did.

Mr. DE FOREST. I said that this so-called second count was made a day or two after the election.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Is it not true that in the Fifth ward, third district, the count was made not a day or two after the election, but that night?

Mr. DE FOREST. I do not know as to that.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. You ought to know, because that is the fact.

Mr. DE FOREST. I know that this second count was made after the first meeting of the board, after they were supposed to have performed their duty, after they had adjourned and separated—when they had become functus officio, and had no right to act any further.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Do you not know that in the case of the Fifth ward, third district, nothing of that kind occurred?

Mr. DE FOREST. That may have been so in one precinct; the gentleman will not claim that the facts were not as I state in the others.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. But this one precinct is enough to elect Mr. Rockwell, if you admit the fact which I assert.

The SPEAKER. Members desiring to interrupt the gentleman on the floor will please address the Chair.

Mr. DE FOREST. Of course the House can not, with any respect for the rights of the parties, entertain any such proposition as that. Why, the gentleman who has just inquired of me in regard to this matter took exception to the way in which the majority of the committee in their report set out the results of these two counts, as they are called. Over the result as it was certified to at the lawful time by the lawful board and in a lawful manner—over the result showing the number of votes received by the candidates respectively they have written "Official;" and over the parallel columns at the right, setting out the vote as it is claimed the second count showed it to be, is the word "Unofficial."

The distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] yesterday took exception to this action on the part of the majority of the committee; he seemed to imagine that this performance, which was gone through with a day or two after the official count was made, constitutes a part of the official returns of the vote that was cast for the candidates respectively.

Nothing of the kind, sir. Nothing could be further from the truth. This writing which is supposed to be put upon the sample ballots does not state at all the number of votes received by the candidates respectively. It simply states the number of pieces of paper that were put in the ballot box of the description indicated by the samples, and that is all.

No gentleman can say that that, on the face of it, imports the true condition of the vote. A mathematician, an unofficial person, inspecting those sample ballots, assuming that the work has been correctly and properly done, can figure out the number of votes received by the candidates respectively; but the words written upon that return and on the back of those ballots does not state how many votes were received by the candidates respectively. It does not constitute a part of the official returns of the number of votes received by the candidates respectively at all.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Then why does the law require it to be put there?

Mr. DE FOREST. For another reason, in order that it may be seen upon inspection whether the ballots were in conformity with the law, whether there was anything about those ballots which would invalidate them in case they were ever called in question.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. And then, when you reach the Doyle ballots, that do not conform to the law, you say, "Count them."

Mr. DE FOREST. I will reach that presently. You argued this case very exhaustively and very ably, and I ask the privilege, not to do the same thing, but to do the best I can.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Thank you.

Mr. DE FOREST. So, then, I say that it is obvious to my mind that the minority of this committee, able gentlemen as they are, when they adopted the course which they have outlined in the minority report, did so, because they comprehended and realized the unanswerable difficulties in the way of an attempt to rely upon this so-called second count. Why, sir, we are supposed to act judicially. Would any court in the world receive evidence of this so-called second count for the purpose of showing the actual condition of the vote? Why, not for a moment.

The authorities are unanimous to the effect that before any such evidence will be received it must be affirmatively, clearly, and satisfactorily shown that no opportunity has intervened for any unlawful tampering with the ballots. Not only is that not shown, but it appears that one of these boxes that was left locked was found on the second occasion to be unlocked. Somebody had been there. Somebody had had an opportunity to take out these ballots, unfold them, and tamper with them.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. A Republican inspector, Mr. Miller, had been there.

Mr. DE FOREST. Gentlemen argue that because the ballots were folded up and put back in the same position as any rogue, of course, who had common sense, would put them back, that therefore they could not have been tampered with. All that was required was on a straight Democratic ticket, if there was a paster in favor of Mr. Noyes, this person who was tampering with the ballots could strip it off; or a dishonest person who wanted to favor the interests of Mr. Rockwell, who had a paster for him, could stick it on to a straight Republican ticket. There was the opportunity. Under such circumstances what court, I say, would receive that evidence? No court would receive it for a single moment. And would the courts of the State of New York, if this question came properly before them, for a single moment have received evidence of the so-called second count. Of course they would not.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. DE FOREST. Yes, I will yield for a question.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. I want to ask for information. You have agreed to the majority report, as I understand. The question is asked on the fourth page of that report—

Why were the votes recounted?

And the answer is—

It appears that the county clerk refused to receive the statements of the results because sample copies of the ballots were not attached, and they were left in the hands of one of the inspectors in the respective districts aforesaid that the sample ballots might be attached, and this being done they were returned to the clerk's office and there deposited.

And then the further question is asked, by whom were the ballots recounted. Now, in point of fact, were they recounted at all, and, if so, by whom?

Mr. DE FOREST. I understand the majority report to say that these canvassers reconvened when they found that the county clerk refused to receive the returns in that form, reconvened in their respective precincts—that is, part of them reconvened; three out of five in one place, two out of five in another, three out of five part of the time and two out of five part of the time in another case, and perhaps all of them in another case, and perhaps in another precinct there was no recount at all made. So the report states.

Mr. O'FERRALL. That is correct.

Mr. DE FOREST. Very well, the gentleman concedes it, it appears. That is all I know about the facts. I gathered my information from what I saw in the report, and from what I have heard in the argument.

Now, I ask if any court in the State of New York with any respect for the law, with any respect for itself, would receive evidence of this so-called second count, made under such circumstances; would receive a count made upon ballots which the statute law of the State had required to be destroyed. Of course it would not, any more than it would allow a party who had suppressed evidence, who had stolen it from the opposite party and refused to produce it when called upon by the court, to introduce it in his own behalf. No court would stultify itself by so doing. A court which did so would make itself the instrument of circumventing that law which it was constituted and sworn to enforce and defend. It would in substance and effect be receiving evidence which the statute law said should not be received; and, sir, we are proposing to govern ourselves somewhat by the rules of justice and by the law of the State of New York.

Why, I say, sir, it is very clear to my mind that the minority, in making their report, saw the difficulties of this position and deliberately abandoned it, and now have returned to it again, not so much because they think it is a stronger position as because they think perhaps it may divert observation from the weakness of the one they have taken in the report, and divide the forces of the enemy.

So, then, I come back to the proposition, that no serious attempt is made here to impeach this remaining plurality of 6 votes, which stand in favor of Noyes, except by virtue of the so-called "Doyle" ballots. Now, then, in regard to those the contestee says they should all be excluded.

Mr. TUCKER. Do they appear in the record by virtue of the recount?

Mr. DE FOREST. No; they were put in the record by putting them on the return which the inspectors made the second time. The contestee asserts that these 16 ballots known as the "Doyle" ballots should all be rejected. His case depends upon the affirmative of that proposition, as I look at it. That proposition he is bound to establish, under the burden of proof that rests upon him, as it ought to rest in this case, not by assertion, not by conjecture, not by an appeal to party feeling and personal friendship, such as has been going on in this House almost from the very day this matter was submitted to the committee, but upon evidence, legal evidence, a clear, fair, satisfactory preponderance of legal evidence, such as courts will receive, such as juries are permitted to consider. There is no other safe or lawful rule for us to follow. If we cut from that mooring it is impossible to conjecture the extremes of injustice to which the currents and gusts of party prejudice may carry us.

Sir, it ought to be borne in mind that this is not simply a question between the immediate parties in this contest. It is a question in which all those who voted the 16 Doyle ballots are interested; it is a question in which the entire population of that Congressional district are interested; it is a question in which the whole body politic of all parties and persuasions is interested. It is a question of public consequence, of public justice, of public morality, of infinitely greater importance than the mere personal right and ambitions of the two worthy gentlemen who are striving for this prize.

And, sir, it is a question which we of the majority, charged with the sole responsibility, and with the sole right to determine it, with no court of appeal where our actions can be reviewed, our errors, if we commit any, rectified, or our bad precedents, if we establish them, destroyed, a question which we conscious, as we must be, of a certain bias in favor of those of our own political affiliation, which we ought to approach and consider and dispose of with an impartiality so unswerving, with a candor so spotless as to rise above all suspicion, all possibility of reproach and criticism. Of all questions it is a question in which we ought to be thankful for, and tenaciously adhere to those well settled principles of evidence, and those rules of judicial procedure which immortal practice and the wisdom of the ages have sanctioned and established. Such being the principles which are to guide us, what has been done?

Why, it seems to me now, so far from having produced that clear satisfactory preponderance of evidence which justice requires, the contestee has utterly failed to produce any legal evidence at all. Think for a moment what is claimed. He says, in the first place, that these Doyle ballots are to be excluded as void upon their face. That is his first proposition. Why void upon the face? Because, he says, they are so marked as to be capable of identification. Why void upon the face, for that reason? Because, he says, of the statute of the State. But the statute of the State does not expressly say so. By implication, he says, the statute by prohibiting the marking of ballots renders them void.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the gentleman from Connecticut permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. DE FOREST. Oh, yes, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. Conceding that election laws in their usual form are directory, is it not true that when the State goes further and seeks to enforce its direction by denouncing a penalty for disobedience, the law then becomes mandatory?

Mr. DE FOREST. It is not true that the ballots under such circumstances are void, and I am going to proceed to demonstrate that. It is not true by the decisions of the courts, by the precedents of Congressional committees, in reason, in justice, or in any other way. The contestant claims that the statute, by prohibiting the marking of ballots, impliedly renders marked ballots void. Now, if the hypothesis was correct the legal conclusion would not be correct. Even if it were true that these 16 ballots on their face appeared to be contrary to the law, it would not be correct as a legal proposition to say that they are, ipso facto, void, in the absence of a statute of the State of New York so expressly declaring.

While it is true as a general proposition, which no lawyer will dispute, that a thing which the law prohibits will in law be considered void, while that is true in regard to most contracts, while it is true in regard to most transactions, it is a rule not without very great and very notable exceptions. The familiar exception of the marriage contract occurs to all our minds. From the foundation of the common law and by the decisions of the courts, almost unanimous, of all civilized States, that contract is held to be valid unless the statute expressly declares that it shall be void, no matter how many informalities and illegalities enter into it.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. On the ground of public policy. Mr. DE FOREST. Precisely; and this is on the ground of public policy, as you will see when I come to the decisions. No matter how many formalities which the law enjoins are omitted, no matter how many formalities which the law prohibits are introduced, the contract is held to be valid unless the statute expressly declares to the contrary. Other exceptions might be cited, and among them this very case that we are now considering, the case of a ballot deposited by a voter which is admitted to be contrary in form to what is required by the law of the State. That question has been decided. It is not a new question. It has been decided in the State of Colorado, in the case of Kellogg vs. Hickman, beginning on the two hundred and fifty-sixth page of 12 Colorado Reports. I refer to page 260, and I read:

I find no case, and I think none can be found, where the deduction of such votes from the count is allowed in the absence of legislative expression against counting or receiving the same. It will be seen that the enactment under consideration does not in terms prohibit the elector from voting a ticket printed on paper different from that prescribed; nor does it declare against the counting or receiving of any such ticket. The parties voting at an election are considered by some courts as parties to a contest of this kind.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Does the law there punish the party voting such a ticket?

Mr. DE FOREST. I will look and see. [Reading:]

The legislative intent of the requirements of section 1281, General Statutes of 1883, as to the form, size, color of paper, etc., of ballots to be used by voters, and making it unlawful to print for distribution, or to distribute at the polls, ballots not conforming to the requirements thereof, was to guard the secrecy of the ballot and secure to the voter the right of suffrage free of restraint; but, after a ballot has been voted, received, and counted, the courts are not authorized, in the absence of constitutional restrictions as to the manner of exercising the right of suffrage, in declaring such ballot illegal merely because printed on paper of different quality, color, or dimensions from that prescribed in the section mentioned.

There is no difference in principle between the requirement that a ballot shall be of a certain color and the requirement that it shall have no distinguishing mark upon it, because the color of a ballot is a more distinguishing mark almost than any other that could be placed upon it.

Mr. GREENLEAF. From what authority is the gentleman reading?

Mr. DE FOREST. The supreme court of Colorado.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Does the gentleman say that he can not find any authorities contravening that?

Mr. DE FOREST. I do.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Then he ought to be impeached. He does not know anything about law. I can give him twenty authorities. [Laughter.]

Mr. DE FOREST. Oh, I have no doubt of it.

Mr. BAILEY. The law there declares the act to be unlawful, but does it denounce a penalty against it?

Mr. DE FOREST. Gentlemen are taking my time. I will read another authority which will answer the gentleman, a Wisconsin case, The State ex rel. Briesen vs. Barden:

The ballots for judicial officers and those for other officers elected on the same day being required by section 89, Revised Statutes, to be put into separate boxes, ballots having the word "Judiciary" printed on the back thereof, are not void under section 3, article III, constitution (which provides that "all votes shall be given by ballot"), nor under section 10, chapter 461, Laws of 1885 (which makes it an offense to print or circulate printed ballots having any printing, engraving, device, or mark of any kind upon the back thereof).

In the Colorado case also it was made an offense, which implies that there was a penalty. I do not know that the text of the decision states what the penalty was. But here is this New York case, which the gentleman yesterday discoursed about; and he omitted to say, if I followed him correctly, that the decision there was predicated upon a law which has been passed since this election that we are considering was held.

Mr. MAGNER. I beg the gentleman's pardon; it is the same act.

Mr. DE FOREST. I beg your pardon; it is not.

Mr. MAGNER. I explained that matter in my speech, and I am willing to do it now if you will yield to me.

Mr. DE FOREST. It was the act as amended which was construed by the court.

Mr. MAGNER. It was this identical act.

Mr. DE FOREST. The amended act.

Mr. MAGNER. I say the amendment detracts from the force of the original act.

Mr. DE FOREST. I understand your argument; but the act as amended, which was under construction in the case and which the gentleman cited, contains that express provision without which the court say that a ballot can not be rejected. The act provides that if upon the ballot or upon any paper affixed thereto, a writing or mark of any kind has been placed by the voter or by any other person to his knowledge with the intent that such ballot shall afterwards be identified as the one voted by him, it shall be void and of no effect.

Mr. MAGNER. Does the gentleman claim that the court of appeals adjudicated that section in its decision?

Mr. DE FOREST. Yes, sir.

Mr. MAGNER. The gentleman, I respectfully submit, has not read correctly the decision which he quotes.

Mr. DE FOREST. Very well; perhaps not.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Judge Cooley, in his book, contravenes that position.

Mr. DE FOREST. The court, in the course of the opinion which it rendered, said that—

In the absence of some clear and positive prohibition in the statute against counting such ballots, the tendency of the courts would undoubtedly be in the direction of effectuating as far as possible the intent of the voter.

Then the court goes on and cites as a ground of the decision the section passed since the election which we are now discussing, to supply a deficiency in the law as it then existed.

Mr. MAGNER. The gentleman will allow me to inform him that the amendatory act did not affect the original act in the manner the gentleman claims, but took away from the board of canvassers a right which they had before possessed.

Mr. DE FOREST. I understood your argument yesterday; but I read the law myself, and take the liberty of drawing my own inferences from it. Where the court in its opinion states that in the absence of any such provision the ballot would not be rejected, and refers to that section as a reason for rejecting it, my inference is—I may be mistaken—that if the ballot is rejected it must be done by virtue of that provision. Not only is this the law as expounded by the courts so far as their adjudications have been brought to our attention (and no gentleman has introduced any case to the contrary, unless it is the one that the gentleman talked about), but in addition to that the course which has been pursued by the Committee on Contested Elections in the Congress of the United States has been the same.

Reference was made here yesterday to Smith's Digest of Contested Elections, by reference to which it will be found that in the Forty-second Congress a Republican committee gave the seat to a Democrat, and in so doing refused to exclude ballots which, by the theory now advanced, ought to have been excluded. A second case in the same volume proceeds on the same theory, and refers to the prior case as its authority.

So I say we are justified in the assertion that the legal proposition which gentlemen make here—even if the hypothesis assumed were established, that these Doyle ballots are upon their face in contravention of law—the legal proposition which is made here that therefore those ballots are void upon their face is unsound and untenable.

But the difficulty lies deeper than this. The difficulty is that those ballots do not upon their face appear to be contrary to the statute. The statute referred to in the report of the minority, the statute upon which so much stress is laid as imposing criminal punishment upon anyone who marks a ballot, does not prohibit absolutely the marking of a ballot, but it prohibits the marking of a ballot by the voter himself.

Now, obviously, it does not appear upon the face of these ballots who marked them. Perhaps they were marked by the voter himself, perhaps not; but that is a matter which is not determined by the face of the ballot. You can not say, therefore, that the ballot on its face is contrary to law. If these 16 ballots were placed side by side it would appear, as found in the majority report, that they were not marked by the voters themselves, but by another person, the marking being in one handwriting.

But considered separately, as they must be considered, it does not appear upon the face of the ballot whether it is contrary to law or not. Therefore it can not be said, in any view of the case, that these ballots on their face are void; and if that position could be maintained it would not help the gentleman any because there are 28 ballots cast for Mr. Rockwell which were marked, and, as I contend, so marked as to be capable of identification.

Mr. MAGNER. Does the gentleman contend that any person witnessing the canvass of those votes could determine that a single one of those ballots was so marked as that it could be identified as having been cast by any particular voter or elector on that day?

Mr. DE FOREST. It is not necessary it should be so marked.

Mr. MAGNER. Does the gentleman contend that these ballots were so marked that any person looking at any ballot after the vote was cast could tell by the mark upon it what individual had cast that particular vote?

Mr. DE FOREST. Neither could that be done in the case of the Doyle ballots.

Mr. MAGNER. Will the gentleman answer the question?

Mr. DE FOREST. I have answered it so far as it relates to this controversy.

Mr. MAGNER. You admit that it could not be done.

Mr. DE FOREST. I do not give way to the gentleman further.

Mr. MAGNER. Then you refuse to answer the question?

Mr. DE FOREST. You refused to answer me on yesterday when you were talking in my time.

Mr. MAGNER. I answered that the Doyle ballots are identifiable, that they can be identified—

Mr. DE FOREST. Oh, Mr. Speaker, it is perfectly evident that a third person could not tell from an inspection of the Doyle ballots who voted them. The parties who were concerned in the fraud, if fraud there was, themselves might tell, and so they could also with reference to the 28 ballots that were voted for Rockwell.

Mr. MAGNER. They were marked all alike.

Mr. DE FOREST. They were marked with a lead pencil and some of them in one place and some in a different place, some with one combination and some with another, and the gentleman knows and this House must know that it is absolutely impossible to make two marks with a lead pencil that would be precisely alike and that could not be separately identified by the party who made them. The evidence shows that they were checked differently, the marks being in one position on one ballot and in a different position on the other, and, as I have said, the combination of numbers being different on each. But suppose they were alike and that you have a conspiracy of twenty-eight persons to vote them, headed by some ringleader. So I say, Mr. Speaker, it would not help the contention of the contestee, for if he was right in all of these positions he would be still in the minority when the 28 ballots are excluded.

But they say no notice was given in the notice of contest. Neither was there any notice given to Mr. Noyes in the answer that these Doyle ballots would be considered or any claim predicated upon them. And so I say, sir, that the gentlemen are driven back to the proposition that these 16 Doyle ballots were in fact obtained by bribery. And the burden of proof is on them.

Now, what have they done? I repeat that to my mind there is an utter failure of evidence to sustain that proposition. Think of it for a moment. Only one of these 16 ballots has been investigated, a ballot supposed to have been cast by one Ollie Ferris.

Now, it is perfectly evident to any man who considers this matter that there is no legal evidence presented to sustain that point. No lawyer here would claim that such an affidavit would be admissible as evidence in a cause on trial before a court, an affidavit which the man expressly repudiated as incorrect, which he refused to sign, in which he began and ended by denying that he had ever been bribed, until just at the close of his testimony the reporter seems to have put in words to the effect that he had received a pair of pants for doing it. But he refused to sign the testimony, on the ground that it was not accurate.

Every lawyer knows, and every gentleman who has ever had any experience in any legal proceedings whatever knows, that that is not legal evidence. But assuming that it is, for the sake of the argument, and that this testimony is admitted, and that it is believed, would the House feel justified on the strength of it in holding that this man, Ferris, was bribed to vote one of these ballots? Assuming that they did, and the vote was rejected, what then? Here is still a plurality of five votes remaining in favor of Mr. Noyes, a plurality which I say there is not the first glimmer of evidence to overthrow. Is there?

Gentlemen have set out in the minority report an array of facts which they say is established by the proof submitted. But the trouble with these facts is that not one of them is legal evidence which would be considered in a judicial examination of the question. Is there one? We will suppose, as suggested in the views of the majority, that they have identified one man who voted a Doyle ballot and whose vote they are trying to impeach. You arrest and arraign the man, and the learned gentleman from Alabama [Mr. COBB] and the learned ex-district attorney from the State of New York [Mr. FELLOWS], who is interested in this matter, eminent counsel both of them, are employed if you please to conduct the prosecution.

What evidence are they going to give to us in support of that contention? Does anybody believe that they would go before any court and claim the facts they set out here in this minority report as admissible evidence to sustain the prosecution? Does anyone imagine that the learned gentlemen would seriously claim that the fact that some one else was bribed would be legal evidence to prove that this man was bribed, or that the fact that McArthur was a bad man and bribed others was legal evidence that he bribed this man, or that the fact that McArthur prepared these ballots in the absence of any proof that this man knew McArthur had any conference with him, or received from him or anyone else any consideration for his vote or was influenced in any degree by any corrupt motive, would be evidence of this man's guilt? Does anybody believe that these gentlemen would have the face to offer that evidence in a court of law to sustain a claim for conviction? We will not require them to prove it beyond a reasonable doubt as in criminal cases, but simply by the preponderance of testimony as in civil cases. Is there anything here that they would seriously think of offering.

There is not a lawyer on this floor, and there is not a layman who has had the slightest acquaintance with judicial proceedings, who does not know that there has not been a magistrate on the bench since the days of Dogberry who would receive such evidence.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. If the gentleman will refer to the decision of the supreme court of New York, the one cited by the minority—

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I know the gentleman desires to be fair.

Mr. DE FOREST. Please do not interrupt me.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. You have made such a mistake. It is a very important matter—

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. DE FOREST. I am arguing this matter, and I do not wish to be interrupted.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. You have made a statement which misleads the House and I want to correct you.

Mr. BLOUNT. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment to correct an error that he has committed.

Mr. DE FOREST. I say that every lawyer and every layman who knows anything about judicial proceedings knows that there is not a court of ordinary intelligence—

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit, with respect to every gentleman in this House, without reference to his views, that we have had scarcely a connected argument on either side of this case by reason of interruptions, and I hope that where a gentleman wishes that the House may hear him these interruptions may be restrained.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. But do you not think it is proper that any man who makes a mistake should be corrected?

Mr. BLOUNT. There is a regular parliamentary way for doing that, and gentlemen are entitled to proceed without interruption if they do not desire to be interrupted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. On each occasion when anyone has arisen to know if the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DE FOREST] desired to yield the Chair has asked him if he desired to yield, and in each case has had no response, and the gentleman has allowed the interruption. The Chair will endeavor to enforce the rule.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Now, I ask the gentleman if he will allow me to correct him in an error he has made?

Mr. DE FOREST. I must decline to be interrupted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. DE FOREST. An effort is made here to invoke the principles of the law of conspiracy, which I suppose is perhaps what the gentleman referred to.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. No.

Mr. DE FOREST. But in order to avail themselves in any respect of that law it is necessary for them to show a conspiracy embracing the entire sixteen men who are supposed to have voted these ballots, and there is not the first semblance to any such conspiracy even suggested in the claim of the contestee.

The offenses which are claimed to have been committed are not offenses which in their nature are capable of the application of the law of conspiracy. The claim is not that sixteen men conspired together to commit one crime, which would make the evidence of what each one said and did admissible against the rest, but the claim is that sixteen separate and distinct offenses were committed by sixteen separate and distinct individuals. Nobody asserts and nobody believes that if these sixteen men were bribed they agreed together to be bribed. There was no necessity for it and no motive for it, and no man who had made up his mind to be bribed, who was intellectually capable of criminal responsibility, would be such a fool as unnecessarily to take into his confidence fifteen other men who could do nothing but betray him. There is not anything within the scope of the contestee's hypothesis here which approaches the domain of the principles of the law of conspiracy so as to make this evidence of other parties admissible against anyone who is supposed to be on trial.

All your evidence goes out. The misconduct of McArthur and his character, the fact that other men were bribed, the fact that McArthur bribed other people, the fact that he prepared these ballots, is all ruled out as irrelevant, immaterial, and inadmissible. The ballot itself would not be admissible. The very ballot that the man you are trying for bribery is admitted to have cast is not admissible, for it does not upon its face import crime. It is just as consistent on its face with the theory of innocence as it is with the theory of crime. Other men, many of them, in that election, voted just such ballots, whose honesty no question is made about; voted ballots with fictitious names in place of the candidate for associate justice of the court of appeals, because they were dissatisfied with the nomination.

The record shows that others voted for fictitious names. That is no evidence of an unlawful motive. The ballot upon its face is just as consistent with the theory of innocence as with the theory of crime, and everywhere and always, where an act is equally consistent with innocence and crime, the presumption is against the theory of crime and in favor of the theory of innocence; and your ballot would not come in, and your prosecution would stand absolutely naked, with nothing but the bare, uncorroborated information itself.

The time of Mr. DE FOREST having expired, Mr. HAUGEN yielded to him to enable him to conclude his remarks.

Mr. DE FOREST. And it is upon that stage of the case we are asked to act, upon a bare, uncorroborated suggestion of fraud, that we, this House of Representatives, acting as judges of the qualifications and election returns of this gentleman, are asked to set aside the verdict which the people of that Congressional district, in accordance with the law of that State, as shown by the returns made out and certified under the decisions of that State, have solemnly rendered.

We ought not to allow ourselves, sir, to do it. We ought not to allow ourselves to listen to the suggestion of party feeling and personal friendship so far as seriously to entertain such a proposition. It would, in my judgment, cast a blot on the honor of the Democratic majority of this House which time would not readily obliterate, which none of us would ever cease to regret, and which this contestee himself in his heart of hearts would not be willing to share.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. COMPTON in the chair). The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HAUGEN] is recognized.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Connecticut may be extended one minute, so that he may answer a question which I desire to ask him with reference to this very case of Clark vs. McKenzie.

Mr. HAUGEN. I do not yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I want to correct the gentleman in his statement about this case.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. HAUGEN. I will state to the gentleman from Alabama that there will be an opportunity of that kind given to the minority, and in your own time you can make that statement.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. The gentleman does not want him corrected. The gentleman wants to have the wrong law before the House.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, this discussion has taken an exceedingly wide range. If the reports submitted by the majority and minority of the Committee on Elections form the issue that is before the House, it would be exceedingly difficult to recognize that as the issue from the discussion here. For my part, Mr. Speaker, I think that the reports submitted by the members of the Committee on Elections place fairly before the House the questions which should determine its action. There are two salient points in controversy—the legality of the 16 so-called "Doyle" ballots which were cast for the contestant, Mr. Noyes, in Waterloo, and the legality of the 28 marked ballots cast for the contestee in the city of Elmira.

The minority report does not question the fact, as stated in the report of the committee, that the court of appeals of the State of New York has settled the right of the contestant to the certificate of election. The question of the recount ought not to be before this House. That question was before the court and was determined by the court, and so conceded in the views of the minority, but has been thrown in here during the discussion to vex and confuse the minds of members whose numerous duties prevent them from a careful and close examination of the record.

A great deal of time has been expended here in endeavoring to make the House believe that this recount, had some days after the election in the county of Seneca, is entitled to more credence than the count that was made by the officers of the election immediately after the closing of the polls. The New York statute provides that after the votes are canvassed the ballots shall be destroyed. It also provides that samples of the different kinds of tickets cast shall be attached to the returns with the number cast of each class indorsed upon the sample. There are three separate statements or returns required. So that where only one ticket of a particular kind is found in the box it becomes necessary to manufacture two like it in order to comply with the law. Now, it is very evident that where ballots are ordered to be destroyed the law can make and does make no provision for a recount. A recount under those circumstances can have no legal recognition. The authorities are uniform, that in order to give any weight to a recount, even where expressly provided for by law, it must appear affirmatively that the ballots have been preserved by the proper officer, and that no opportunity has been given to tamper with them. But where the law prescribes that they shall be destroyed there can be no such custody.

But it is claimed that the statements upon the sample ballots would show the actual vote cast. I think the law intended that it should, but the court of appeals, in this very case of Noyes against the board of supervisors, says that where there is a discrepancy between the face of the returns and the aggregate of figures upon the sample ballots, the former shall control. The county clerk of Seneca County testifies that this law requiring the attachment of sample ballots to the returns was disregarded in three-fourths of the precincts of that county. It further appears that the local inspectors did not deem it necessary to attach to the returns samples of split tickets, but only samples of regular party tickets. And they were led into that mistake, if it be a mistake, by the construction placed upon the law by the secretary of state of the State of New York. Let me refer to the code of election laws sent out by the secretary of state to all the election officers before this election.

The Legislature of the State of New York in 1890 ordered that the secretary of state should send to the election officers of the State the election laws in codified form, and that he should include in the election code prepared by him, such suggestions and directions as to the procedure at the polls as were deemed proper. I presume that he naturally consulted, in a matter of that kind, the legal officers of the State. In compliance with that act of 1890, the secretary of state did send out an election code, and in that code I find this amongst his instructions: "The statement of the canvass having been duly made out, one of each kind of the regular ballots that have been given for the officer who is to be chosen, except for electors for President and Vice-President, must be securely attached to the statement."

It will be noticed that he uses the words "regular ballots," and that was quite naturally taken to mean the regular party tickets by the election officers. And so we find that the split tickets were destroyed in most of the precincts with the other ballots. So not only could there be no recount, but there could be no reliable or intelligent recasting of the vote from the figures on the sample ballots.

There is no charge of fraud against any of the local officials. They may have acted with entire innocence.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. MAGNER] who addressed the House on yesterday stated that the contestee in this case never had a day in court, and that the decision of the supreme court had nothing to do with the merits of the case; that the court would not go into the question of the legality or illegality of the ballots upon the mandamus proceedings before it. There is certainly nothing in the law of 1880, under which these proceedings were brought, in any manner limiting or abridging the court in getting all the facts in dispute before it and determining the very merits of the controversy. That law is set forth at length on the tenth page of the report. I will read so much of it as seems to bear upon the question I am discussing:

Whenever it shall appear by affidavit that errors have occurred in the determination of the board of county canvassers in any county in this State, the supreme court may by order require said board to correct such errors, or show cause why such correction should not be made, and in the event of the failure of said board to make such correction, or show cause, as aforesaid, the said court may compel said board by writ of mandamus to correct such errors; and if such board of county canvassers shall have made its determination and dissolved, such court may compel it to reconvene for the purpose of making such corrections.

If these Doyle ballots so called, which have been discussed here so much, and of which all the members of the House know something by this time, were improperly counted for the contestant in this case, this law certainly seems to give to the contestee the right to have brought that question before the supreme court of the State of New York and to have had it settled. Not only was it perfectly proper under this law—the law is plain on that point—but the very decision in the Nichols case, which the gentleman cited here yesterday was based upon a state of facts exactly similar to this. That question was brought before the supreme court in that case. The court took jurisdiction and decided as to the legality of certain ballots, and the court of appeals sustained the decision of the supreme court and, by the decision of the highest tribunal in the State of New York, 1,252 men were disfranchised.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Will my colleague on the committee yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HAUGEN. Certainly.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Do you not know that under that narrow proceeding of mandamus in this case of Noyes vs. Rockwell, no issue was presented except the one as to whether the returns should be counted from their face or from the numbers on the sample ballots? Do you not know that that alone was the issue?

Mr. HAUGEN. It was the issue, because the contestee at that time hoped to succeed by joining issue upon the facts set forth in the contestant's petition. Contestee chose to make that the only issue, waiving his privilege to have the other questions passed upon, as I think he might under this law.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. It was the issue made by the contestant, and the contestee was confined to it.

Mr. HAUGEN. Oh, no; when the contestee joined issue with the contestant he could have brought that whole matter in. It takes two parties to make up the issue. He might have brought separate proceedings had he been very anxious to have these matters all settled by the courts of his State.

I will read the first sentence in the Nichols case—

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Just a moment.

Mr. HAUGEN. I do not want the gentleman to take up all my time. I am not going to occupy three hours. [Laughter.] However, I yield for a question.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. I just want to bring the attention of the gentleman to the true condition of this matter. The contestant commenced a proceeding by mandamus, and in his affidavit for the writ of mandamus alleged only one error committed by the canvassing board. That error was, that they counted from the sample ballots and not from the face of the returns, and, having made that issue, nothing could have been before the court under the narrow mandamus proceeding except that one point.

Mr. O'FERRALL. Will my colleague, Mr. HAUGEN, yield to me, to ask the gentleman from Alabama a question?

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield to the chairman of the committee [Mr. O'FERRALL].

Mr. O'FERRALL. I want to ask the gentleman from Alabama whether or not Mr. Rockwell, the contestee, could not have introduced an independent proceeding in the way of mandamus, and brought this question before the court, and whether he did not decline or fail to do so?

Mr. COBB of Alabama. He could not have done it because he had the certificate of election, and there was nothing on which he could base an appeal to the court.

Mr. O'FERRALL. But his title to the certificate of election was being attacked in the court by Mr. Noyes, and he could have instituted an independent proceeding.

Mr. COCKRAN. Can the gentleman cite any authority for that?

Mr. O'FERRALL. Your own New York statute gives authority.

Mr. COCKRAN. Which statute?

Mr. O'FERRALL. The statute of New York; the law of 1880.

Mr. COCKRAN. Gives authority for the man holding the certificate to bring such a proceeding?

Mr. O'FERRALL. Yes; the man holding the certificate.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I can not yield any further; I would like to have a little of this time myself. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTLER. You are having as little of it now as you can possibly have. [Laughter.]

Mr. HAUGEN. But the contestee did not have any certificate of election when these proceedings were instituted and did not have it until after the special term decided against him. The officers of the canvassing board of the county of Seneca testified that when they were served with the writ of mandamus in this case they understood that this matter of the "Doyle" ballot was involved in the proceedings. If they were not brought in issue before the supreme court that is certainly the fault of the contestee. The courts were open to him and he might have had all these disputed questions determined. I will read just the first sentence from the opinion of the court in the Nichols case in order to indicate the nature of that case. Judge O'Brien says:

The supreme court has awarded a peremptory writ of mandamus directed to the board of supervisors of Onondaga County, as a board of county canvassers, commanding them to reject and exclude from their statements and computation of the votes cast for Rufus Peck in that county for the office of senator for the twenty-fifth senatorial district, certain ballots cast in the ninth election district hereinafter mentioned.

The court took jurisdiction and rejected the challenged ballots—1,252 of them.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that the record in this case shows that the contestee himself considered that the merits were involved. If he did not, why did he fight it in the way he did? Why did he spend his time and his money and make every effort in his power to get a decision in his favor in the supreme court and in the court of appeals of the State of New York?

Two actions were commenced, one in Seneca County and one in Chemung. Each passed through the special and general terms of the supreme courts for those counties, the judges in each case holding in favor of the contestant. Appeals were taken to the court of appeals and that court sustained the decision of the lower courts, and it is idle to say now that the contestee went through all this harassing procedure merely for the purpose of establishing a precedent to apply to the local officers of election and on the theory that there was nothing involved touching the merits of his case. He did not so understand it, and if he had come here with the decision of the court of appeals in his favor he certainly would have rested his case upon that decision, as he would have had a right to do.

We all admit that this House is not absolutely bound by the decision of the court; but I stand in this case exactly where I stood when the election case from Pennsylvania was considered by this House a few weeks ago. I then honestly thought that the court of the State of Pennsylvania had settled the question which ought to control the decision of the House in that case; and I think now that the court of appeals of the State of New York has settled the question before us in this case—not so as to bind us absolutely, of course, because we can overrule the decision of the court if we think proper.

When the question has been so distinctly and fully presented to the court as this question has been, it would seem that the decision of such a tribunal ought to be accepted rather than be overturned by this House, because, with all due respect to the House, I think its decisions in matters of this kind do not command the highest respect.

Mr. Rockwell did not hold the certificate of election at the time the mandamus was applied for by Mr. Noyes. The mandamus proceedings were commenced and argued in November upon affidavits sworn to in November, and the certificate was obtained by Mr. Rockwell in December.

All this appears in the record. It would certainly have been more in accordance with propriety if the officers had delayed the issuing of that certificate until the decision could have been had from the highest court of the State. But the certificate was rushed through immediately after the decision of the supreme court in special session and sent to the contestee without awaiting the decision of the higher courts.

I shall not go over in detail the arguments which have been made on the other side; but I want to touch on a few matters which have been referred to. As I see the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS] before me, I want to say that I am credibly informed that the newspaper article which he introduced here on day before yesterday was taken from a paper which did not support Mr. Noyes in this campaign. Whether it was a Republican or Democratic paper I do not know, but I understand it did not support Mr. Noyes. So that the article ought not to come in here with any particular weight.

Mr. CUMMINGS. My friend is right. Achilles "sulked in his tent."

Mr. RAINES. Achilles did not stay in his tent; he was out working against Mr. Noyes.

Mr. HAUGEN. I do not know anything about that matter myself. The article was brought in here in such a way that the inference might naturally be drawn that it was an expression from a friend of Mr. Noyes. That is not so. I do not know that this ought to have any particular bearing on this case, but the statement in that newspaper article shows, if it expresses the views of the editor, that he thinks Mr. Noyes was elected. But the case ought not to be determined upon evidence of that character. We have to adjudge this case upon the facts before us.

So far as I am concerned, I am not situated so fortunately as the gentleman from New York [Mr. BACON] who addressed the House the other day. He said he spoke from his own personal knowledge. Now, I have no personal knowledge about this matter. I have bestowed considerable time and attention upon this record, and I think I know something about it. In my statements here I state what I understand to be sustained by the record, and by the matters brought to our attention in the argument of counsel.

I have before me the views of the minority in this case, and as I said at the outset, I think the minority make only one issue here; and that is as to the casting out of the Doyle ballots and the casting out of the 28 marked ballots in the city of Elmira. In the written views which, as a member of the committee I submitted to the House separately upon this case, I took exception to the admission made by the minority in their report, that 2 votes should be deducted from the total of Mr. Noyes's vote as having been cast by these two men who, it is alleged, were bribed to vote for Mr. Noyes.

I do not contend that there is no evidence to show that an effort was made to bribe these men; I admit there is some evidence to show that; but in order to warrant the deduction of votes from a man's aggregate of votes it is necessary that there should be not only an attempt made but that it should be carried out. And I contend there is no evidence in the record to show that these men voted the Republican ticket or voted for Noyes. If this attempt at bribery had been made in proximity to the polling place, I admit there would be some force in the position taken here with reference to those 2 ballots; but the evidence is that the attempt was made at some place remote from the polls; and there is no evidence, so far as I have been able to discover, to show that these men voted as these alleged bribers wanted them to vote.

But as far as that goes it does not change the result. Nothing hinges on that. These two ballots, admitting them or deducting them, in either event would not change the result of the election; and for that reason I did not dwell at length on them, but simply dissented from the view of the committee in deducting them.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Then, on your theory you could not convict a man of murder, unless you saw the bullet that killed him go into him. [Laughter.]

Mr. HAUGEN. Not at all; that is not a parallel case. That is the gentleman's own conclusion. The law of New York provides for a secret ballot. It was undoubtedly enacted for the purpose of doing away with the temptation to buy voters, and to defeat the object of the briber. Why, you can buy a voter in New York under the present system of voting, but you can not tell whether he complies with his bargain and votes as he promises. He can not be followed into the booth where he finally selects and prepares his ticket.

Now, in the report of the minority, my friend from Alabama [Mr. COBB] takes the position that the pasters on the ballots, under the law of New York, must be printed entirely, and can have no writing whatever upon them. I presume that it is for the purpose of showing that the Doyle ballots, all of which had "Doyle" written upon them, were within the meaning of the law "marked ballots," and that they could not be admitted or considered under any circumstances. He says in his report that even though it is not proven that the voters were bribed, he falls back upon the theory that they were marked ballots, and under the law should be excluded.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. I hope my friend will allow me a single moment just there.

Mr. HAUGEN. Very well; please be brief.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. My friend over here on this side made the same error in the course of his argument. I did not assert that the mere fact that they were marked ballots would exclude them; but I allude to it as a circumstance which, taken in connection with other circumstances, would warrant their rejection.

Mr. HAUGEN. Well, nearly all of the members of the House no doubt have the report of the gentleman from Alabama before them. I do not desire to misquote my friend from Alabama, and I do not think that he would suspect me of doing such a thing. But in order that there shall be no misunderstanding I quote the gentleman's own language. He says in his report, near the bottom of the fifth page:

But we would not be understood to assert that the intent with which the Doyle names were put on the ballots should be disclosed. It is quite sufficient if these names were "marks" by means of which the ballots so marked could be identified as having been cast by certain persons.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Certainly, unless the marking—

Mr. HAUGEN. Well, I have quoted the gentleman on that point and quoted him accurately, and I think I must decline to yield further.

Now, the enactment by the Legislature of New York of what is known as the law of 1890 was the result of much contention on the part of the parties in the Legislature and the executive of the State. This is not the original bill which was introduced in the Legislature, commonly known as the Saxton bill; the one enacted into law is a modification of that. I understand that this is called the Saxton law, but it is not the original bill; and I think I can show the House that the intention of the Legislature when it passed this act was not to prohibit the writing of names on the paster which the law permits to be affixed to the official ballots.

The original Saxton bill in New York was, as I understand it, a bill to carry out the Australian system, so called, in its purity, and was a bill providing for official ballots only. A man would, under it have had to go into a booth, and there select the candidate for whom he desired to vote from the names of all the candidates for a particular office without assistance, and step out and vote that ballot—an official ballot and none other. That bill passed the Legislature, and was presented to the governor of the State and the governor vetoed it. I have before me the senate journal of New York for 1890. Governor Hill based his veto on constitutional grounds, and is quite elaborate as to the meaning in the constitution of the word "ballot."

He said:

The constitution guarantees to the people a continuance of the right to vote "by ballot," which they enjoyed at the time of its adoption. (Article 2, section 5.)

The kind of ballot proposed by this bill is not the kind of ballot then in use, nor that which the constitution contemplated.

In fact the species of conglomerated ballot now sought to be adopted has only been invented a few years, and was wholly unknown when our present constitution went into effect.

A paper ticket containing the names written or printed or partly written and partly printed, of the candidates and of those only for whom an elector intends to vote, and containing the names of the offices which they are to fill, is the ballot which was in existence when our constitution was adopted, and was so defined by the statute.

That species of ballot can not be changed without an amendment of the constitution. The Legislature has not power to alter it.

Then he goes on to argue in favor of manhood suffrage, and it is very good doctrine that he lays down. In compliance with the suggestions contained in the veto message, the Saxton bill was reintroduced with modifications thought sufficient to overcome the objections of the governor. One of these changes was to the effect that a complete ticket, called a paster, might be placed on the official ballot. A man may take a ticket from anybody outside the polling-place and fix it up to suit himself or have it prepared for him. The law does not prohibit that.

Then, under the arrangements made in New York for voting, he can take that ticket into the booth with him. He can not vote any but an official ballot, but he can take the sticker ballot, containing the names of all the candidates, if you please, and put it on the face of the official ballot, and it becomes thereby a part of the official ballot; and the law provides that the names that are pasted onto the official ballot shall be counted, and that the names printed thereon shall be disregarded whether covered or not by the sticker.

Mr. COX of New York. That is to do away with the educational qualification, is it not?

Mr. HAUGEN. I understand it was to do away with the educational qualification. The governor stated in his veto message that if the purely Australian system was enacted into law in the State of New York a great many men would be prevented from casting their ballots, and he said that such a law would be unconstitutional and that he never would sign such an act.

What is there, then, to hinder any man who prepares a ballot for an illiterate voter from marking it so that the man who prepares it can tell whether it comes out of the ballot box or not? There is nothing to prohibit it. If I write a name into a ballot for a man I will know when that ballot comes out of the ballot box whether he voted it. If he can not read or write and places confidence in me, and I betray him by marking his ballot so that it may be known to me, by writing a fictitious name upon it, is his ballot as to the rest of the ticket to be excluded? Is he to be disfranchised because of his misfortune and my dishonesty? There is no such law anywhere, and there can not be.

Now, there is nothing upon the face of these Doyle ballots to show that there was any fraudulent purpose in casting them. They are all perfect in themselves. The name is written in there, and according to the rules generally laid down by the courts the name that is written must control as between that and the name that is printed, because it is supposed to show more definitely the intent of the voter. There were other fictitious names used on ballots cast in that district than the name of Doyle. Our friend Sam Small got some votes for judge in this district. It was a fictitious name. No such man lived in the precinct where the vote was cast. Several other fictitious names, which I do not now recall, were voted.

But they say there was a conspiracy existing here between Mongin, McArthur and Sweet as to these Doyle ballots. Mongin was the Congressional committeeman for Seneca County. Within the party he was the man who was to look after the interests of Mr. Noyes in that county. Now, there is nothing in this evidence anywhere to connect Mongin with those Doyle ballots, not one particle of proof. He did not buy any of these votes that it is alleged were bought.

There is testimony to show that he was present in the saloon of Andrew Harmon on the day of election; but there is nothing to show that he did anything improper. The witness who testifies he was there did not hear him say anything about the election. He did not hear him talk about buying votes or hear him say anything that would cast any suspicion upon his errand there. For aught that appears in the evidence, he was entirely innocent of any connection with these Doyle ballots, and there is nothing in the evidence to show that the Doyle ballots were designed to help Mr. Noyes.

The different Doyle names were written into the tickets in lieu of the name of the regular candidate for judge of the court of appeals. The Democratic and Republican State committees had usurped the power of placing a Democrat in nomination for that high office. Many Republicans were dissatisfied with this, and it is quite likely that the insertion of these fictitious names for judge was merely an expression of indignation on the part of the voter against the assumption of authority by the committee.

These Doyle votes were all on pasters, as I have said, and they were all on Republican pasters. There is some evidence going to show that McArthur had written this name "Doyle" upon the tickets. McArthur was a merchant in the town of Waterloo and a man of good standing. He and Mongin are both in business there, good citizens as far as the evidence shows. Let us look at the evidence as to Mongin. The contestant says he was the Congressional committeeman. He says he paid him no money.

Nugent, the county clerk, says he was a Republican worker. Sheradin saw him in Harmon's saloon. But Andy Harmon was the man that Sheradin dealt with, and not Mongin. Leddick says he thinks he saw him in Harmon's saloon, but he is not positive. He says he was a Republican worker. That is all the evidence there is upon that subject, except the evidence of a man by the name of Warren; and the minority report dwells with some little detail on that, and claims that there is evidence to show that Warren paid a man some money at the request of Mongin to vote one of these Doyle ballots. All the evidence there is on that subject is that Warren was going down the street, and he passed by where Mongin was standing, and Mongin said "Do you see that man over there?" He said he did. Mongin said "I wish you would take this money and hand it to him."

This was said openly and before everybody. He said he took the money, went along, and when he got to where the man was, he said: "Mongin sent this money to you," and handed it to him. He was asked by the attorney for the contestee if there was anything suspicious about it, if he did not suspect something wrong; and he said he did not; that there was nothing suspicious about it. It was something that was done openly on the street, before everybody, and that is all the evidence there is on that subject. They claim that there was an attempt to bribe that stranger whom nobody knows, whose name is not given in the record, and who it does not appear was a voter in the precinct.

Now, as to Ollie Ferris, I will not spend much time upon his testimony. It is here before you unsigned. It is repudiated by Ollie Ferris himself. He says he did not say what the reporter had reported him as saying. I want to say this testimony was taken by agreement of counsel by a shorthand reporter, and several days after it was taken it was transcribed and submitted to the witnesses and signed, and when this testimony was submitted to Ferris he said that he was not correctly reported, and refused to sign it.

I have no more respect for Mr. Ferris than has the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. COBB]. I think his testimony is so contradictory, he was so evasive in his answers, that not much weight should be given to it; but when he repudiates the statements that he is reported to have made, there is no sense in taking that repudiated statement and considering it as evidence. Now he is the only man who says that he voted a Doyle ticket. The other men who are alleged to have been bribed do not say that the tickets voted by them were Doyle ballots.

The contestee has received everything that he can properly ask. He has received the benefit of the 2 ballots of Sheridan and Green.

Now, as to Mr. Green I simply want to say this: The testimony here shows that he is a Republican, and I can not see what object there could be in bribing a Republican to vote the Republican ticket. That is not the kind of man who is solicited to vote by the use of money. There can not be any object in that. But I say the majority of the committee has given the contestee credit for that vote. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DE FOREST] has argued the question of the Doyle ballots so well that I shall not dwell upon them longer.

But I will consider briefly the 28 marked ballots cast in the city of Elmira. It is stated here by those who have opposed the report of the committee that those 28 ballots can not be considered in this case for the reason that there was no notice given in the notice of contest that they would be challenged. Neither is there any notice given in the answer of the contestee that the Doyle ballots would be challenged, and that evidence can not be brought in here unless it be brought in under the broad, sweeping charge that is made as to bribery.

Now, I think we are all pretty well agreed, so far as the committee is concerned, that it is not shown that the Doyle ballots were bribed ballots, but that if they are excluded they must be excluded as marked ballots, and then I say that there is nothing in the answer of the contestee challenging any marked ballots. Testimony was received regarding them. They are before the House now. It has not been the desire of the committee to keep anything bearing upon the case from being considered; but I say the two cases stand upon ground that is precisely alike. The Doyle ballots are before you as marked ballots, and those 28 ballots are also before you as marked ballots, notice of neither having been given in the notice of contest or in the answer.

I ought to say, perhaps, one more word before leaving the Doyle ballots. The majority has been challenged here to explain why Mongin, McArthur, and Sweet were not put upon the witness stand in the village of Waterloo when this question was up for consideration, and made to testify in respect to their action in relation to these Doyle ballots and in relation to the election on that day. Why, Mr. Speaker, these witnesses, I am informed, were in court. It is a peculiar state of affairs in this case, and a departure from the rule in submitting evidence before the Committee on Elections, that the subpoenas issued for witnesses have not been returned to the committee. There is no record of the subpoenas issued, as is usually the case.

But I am informed that contestee subpoenaed about forty witnesses at Waterloo where these Doyle ballots were cast, and among them were Mongin, McArthur, Sweet, and Andrews. These are the very men who are charged with having corrupted the voters. Now, I state here, and I say that it is not in the evidence, but I state it upon information which I believe to be true, that Mongin and McArthur, and Sweet were in the court room during the taking of all this evidence for the contestee at Waterloo. They were there expecting to be called to testify. They were there until the close of the case at Waterloo, and they were not called. Why should the contestant call witnesses that the contestee had summoned, and who were present ready to be sworn? That ought to dispose of that question.

Mr. HENDERSON of Illinois. Subpoenaed by them?

Mr. HAUGEN. Subpoenaed by the contestee. They were in the court; they were waiting to be sworn, and not called to be sworn. I will state that I am informed that that is the fact by Mr. Sutherland, the attorney for the contestant. At that time the contestee was trying to overcome this majority of 16 that was declared to have been cast against him by the decision of the court of appeals of the State of New York. He recognized the fact that the burden of proving that he was elected had shifted to him, even if he did hold the certificate of election. It is generally agreed by all the attorneys who have discussed the case that where the law provides that the ballots shall be preserved they must be preserved in accordance with the law in order to be considered.

Now, how were these Doyle ballots preserved? They were carried around in the vest pocket of the chairman of the election board of the precinct. The day after election he appeared before the board of county canvassers with the returns and said, "Here are some tickets that we had some doubt about," and reached down into his pocket and fished out these ballots. [Laughter.] Now, I do not know how much contention there was over the Doyle ballots during the count on the evening of the election, but the law as to the sticking on of one of the sample ballots to each of the three returns was not complied with as to these Doyle ballots.

If it was complied with, then we can not tell whether the Doyle ballots before us are copies or originals, because there was only one of each kind, and the law provides that there shall be three sample ballots in each case; that is, where there is only one ballot of a certain kind cast, two others must be manufactured in order to comply with the law requiring that a sample ballot shall be put upon each one of the three returns.

Coming down now to the 28 votes which were cast in the city of Elmira, those ballots were all Democratic stickers, having a figure in one corner and a certain check mark in the other corner, the marks varying so that sometimes the check mark and the figures were in reverse positions.

Now, what are the facts as to those 28 ballots? They were challenged at the polling place. The Republican members of the board of canvassers on the evening of the election challenged those ballots, and said they ought not to be counted; that the mark upon them was not a name, but a distinguishing mark, and that therefore they ought not to be counted. The Republicans were overruled by the Democratic members of the board, who constituted the majority. I think the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] stated yesterday that they were not in the majority, but he was mistaken. If he will look at page 26 of the record he will find that there were three Democrats and two Republicans on that board. Those marked ballots were challenged; but they were admitted. They were counted, and go to make up the total vote of the contestee in this case.

Evidence in regard to them was introduced or attempted to be introduced by contestant. On page 22 of the record we find that the chairman of the town board was called and put upon the witness stand. He was a Democrat, a Democratic inspector of election in his ward, as he testifies. It appears afterwards by the testimony of another witness that he was the chairman. The question was put to him:

When the count was being made did you notice among the ballots for Representative in Congress any marked ballots?

Under the instruction of the contestee's counsel he refused to answer that question. Why did he refuse? Was it because it would have injured Mr. Rockwell's case to have had him answer it? Is that the reason? It is fair to presume that when a man refuses to answer under the instructions of counsel the counsel is afraid of his answer. At least, if he had answered that first question then he would have been required to answer these other questions which also were put to him, and which he also refused to answer:

Q. How many marked ballots were among the ballots at that election? What kind of ballots as to Republican, Democratic, or Republican or Democratic pasters?

Q. Was there considerable discussion among the board as to whether such ballots should be counted?

Q. What was the character of the marks upon the ballots, and give a description of the same?

Q. Were these ballots counted?

Q. After the count were they destroyed with the other ballots?

Q. What disposition was made of them?

Q. Had you any knowledge of the meaning of the mark upon these ballots?

Each one of those questions he refused to answer under instructions of contestee's counsel. This witness is Mr. Sheehan, the chairman of the board. Michael Connelly, also a Democrat, a clerk of election, was sworn, and under instructions of contestee's counsel he refused to answer. Jerry McCarthy likewise, John D. Donovan likewise, and Thomas Cooklyn in the same manner.

We come, then, to the testimony of Mr. Tubbs, a Republican member of the election board. He goes on and testifies as to these marks that have been described here, and says that Mr. Sheehan carried those ballots off in the ballot box with him, and that he has never seen them since.

Now, if Mr. Sheehan had answered these questions put to him, demand would undoubtedly have been made upon him to produce those ballots, and they might have been produced here and we could have judged for ourselves whether they should be regarded as marked ballots or not. But the friends of contestee have destroyed or suppressed the evidence and deprived this House of the opportunity of determining for itself whether the ballots should be counted or should be thrown out, and now he wants the benefit of their wrongdoing. It looks, at least, a little suspicious that such a course should have been pursued by contestee's counsel.

Now, Mr. Speaker, all the evidence tending to show that there was any conspiracy in this case is found on page 59 of the record. There is some evidence which undertakes to impute improper motives to men—I will not call it evidence—but there are charges involved in the questions of counsel. In almost every instance I might say, except as to the two witnesses who swear that they were bribed, or that the attempt was made to bribe them, the witness denies the imputation implied in the questions of counsel.

We have to meet here charges that are not proved by witnesses—charges which, if found in the record at all, are merely involved by implication in the questions of counsel. On page 59 the attempt is made to prove that there was a conspiracy. The testimony is brief, and I will read it. I read from the testimony of John Coughlin, taken at Waterloo:

Redirect examination by Mr. STANCHFIELD:

You have heard as a matter of public rumor that Andy Harmon was bought up by Mongin and was buying Democratic tickets all day?

I heard it on the street.

Matter of public notoriety?

Yes, sir.

Has been ever since election day?

Yes, sir.

By Mr. MANNING:

Did you hear that Mr. Mongin had hired Burrall's office there and opened a bank there within 150 feet of the polls?

Somebody did it.

In which parties were rushed in and paid off?

I don't know whether they were rushed in and paid off or not.

Did you hear such report?

I heard they had rented—

Was it notorious in the street—that is, what the object was?

They had a house of some kind there; I don't know what it was.

Weren't most of the visitors there purchasable Democrats?

That I couldn't say.

Now, that is all the evidence there is on this question of conspiracy. The man testified that he had no knowledge of anything of the kind; yet the charge goes out, and it is argued seriously before the House, that there was in this case a conspiracy which ought to defeat the contestant. As has been suggested, if we are to take the questions of counsel as evidence we might establish almost anything.

Now, this man Harmon—I do not know whether I ought to say anything about him—was, it seems, a Democrat. He was a lock-tender on the canal; had been appointed by the Democratic authorities. His appointment was very unsatisfactory to the local Democracy; they were very bitter against him, and he—more in a spirit of revenge I presume than because of any love for the Republican party—worked for the Republican ticket all day on election day. He is the man who, one of the witnesses says, paid him $2. But I leave that.

But, Mr. Speaker, a mere suspicion certainly ought not to determine a case of this kind either for or against the contestant.

On this point allow me to make a citation from the report of the minority. They say, referring to the 28 ballots cast at Elmira—

This evidence may perhaps raise suspicion of wrongdoing. But suspicion of fraud does not establish it.

We say the evidence as to the Doyle ballots may perhaps raise suspicion of wrongdoing, but suspicion of fraud does not establish it.

As to the law of bribery, I desire to say a few words, and I will close. I refer in the first place to the case of "The People ex rel., Timothy F. Bush, respondent, against William L. Thornton, appellant, reported in 25 Hun., 456."

This was a quo warranto brought by Bush to oust Thornton from the office of county judge of Sullivan County, for which office the two were candidates in November, 1878. The certificate of election showed Thornton to have received the greater number of votes. He was sworn in and entered upon the discharge of the duties of his office. The action was tried by the court without a jury, and judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff, ousting the defendant from his office upon the ground that the defendant had bribed enough voters to bring about his election by the publication of a circular pledging himself, if elected, to accept less than one-half the statutory salary and in addition to pay the expenses of the care of his office.

An appeal was taken to the general term. That court reversed the judgment below upon the ground that the plaintiff had failed to prove actual bribery; that he had only proved it by inference, which was not sufficient to sustain a judgment which, in effect, deprived a certain number of voters of their votes. The general term say, at page 459:

No proof was given on the trial, nor was any offered, showing or tending to show by just legal intent that any vote was cast for the defendant by reason of his promises and pledges to accept $1,200 for his services in case of his election.

I want to say that in Wisconsin the reverse of this has been judicially held on a similar state of facts. It has been held there that where a candidate for office offers to remit a part of his salary in case of his election, that is bribery. But the court of New York has held that this alone is not sufficient proof of bribery; and I presume that gentlemen who are professedly States rights Democrats will take no exception to my citing decisions of the courts of New York:

The court continues, at the bottom of page 460:

Now is it made to appear that there were 235 or 234 illegal votes counted for the defendant? It was laid down in ex parte Murphy (7 Cowen, 153), that the fact should be shown affirmatively that a sufficient number of improper votes were received for the successful party to reduce it to a minority if they had been rejected or the election should stand. In The State ex. Olin (23 Wis., 309), it was held that the burden of proof was upon the party denying the legality of the vote actually cast, and that this rule applied to a vote obtained by bribery.

The court then cites the case of The State against Purdy (36 Wis., 212), as holding in effect—

That if the defendant succeeds in showing * * * that certain votes were obtained by bribery, the votes so obtained should be rejected.

Assuming it proved here that 2 ballots were cast by voters who had been bribed, the majority in this case has rejected those 2 ballots.

The court then continues, at the bottom of page 461, in these words:

It can not be fairly presumed that a person committed an offense on proof simply that he was tempted. The court should not presume in the absence of any satisfactory evidence of the fact that any voter acted in giving his vote both immorally and criminally. This was a matter to be proved—a fact to be substantiated by competent evidence—before it could be made the basis of judicial action.

The court continued, citing from The People vs. Cicott (16 Mich., 305):

No voters who have honestly voted ought to lose their ballots unless it is impossible to give them effect.

The court then say in this case:

It may seem highly probable that some of the electors accepted the alleged bribe and gave the defendant illegal votes. This, however, is not made certain either by direct proof of the fact, or by fair and necessary legal intent.

On page 463, the court continue:

Therefore, in the absence of affirmative proof that there were at least 264 illegal votes (that is, in this case at least 264 votes cast by the bribed voters) allowed to the defendant in the county canvass, the judgment of ouster against him can not be sustained on the ground that he did not receive a majority of the legal votes cast at the election.

Relying upon this ground as a basis for a judgment of ouster against the defendant, the relator must make the affirmative proof above indicated or fail in the action.

It will be noted in this connection that the decision of the court of appeals in the proceeding instituted by Noyes against the county canvassers amounted in effect to an award of the certificate of election to Mr. Noyes, and that the burden of proof is cast upon Rockwell to show that he (Rockwell) actually received a majority of the legal votes.

We contend that the mere production of a few marked ballots does not of itself prove that they were cast by bribed voters; and, in the language of the opinion above quoted, we argue that "this was a matter to be proved, a fact to be substantiated by competent evidence before it could be made the basis of judicial action," and that "no voters who have honestly voted ought to lose their ballots unless it is impossible to give them effect," no matter how "highly probable that some of the electors accepted the alleged bribe and gave the defendant illegal votes."

The courts do not deal in probabilities, but demand proof. The marked ballots are entirely consistent with innocence on the part of the voter. Many men are ignorant; many even are unable to read. It was lawful to distribute pasters; these marked ballots were all pasters, and I think it is "highly probable" that most, if not all of them, were cast by voters voting them because they could be more certain of voting the ticket of their choice by accepting these pasters from a man whom they recognized, than by taking the chance of going alone into the booth and selecting the right ballot from the large number of official ballots put into their hands.

It is in evidence that at the election of 1890 there were placed in the hand of every voter by the election officers, a full Republican ticket, a full Democratic ticket, a full Prohibition ticket, a partial Socialistic Labor ticket and a blank ballot containing the titles of the offices to be filled, with places to write in the names of the candidates, making five official ballots given to every voter. It is easy to see, therefore, how the ignorant man, or even how one of moderate capacity would much prefer to get a paster in his hands which he was sure was the right one, before he enters the booth at all, rather than to take his chance of making a mistake in identifying from these five official ballots the particular one that he wished to cast.

Because the man who handed the voter this paster had previously marked it, and possibly intended to attempt to buy the vote of some other elector, does not prove that the particular elector who cast it had been offered a bribe or that he cast it because of a bribe. Indeed, the mere fact of the marking of the ballot does not even render it "highly probable that some of the electors gave the defendant illegal votes."

But even assuming that three, which is the greatest number claimed by Rockwell, were actually bribed for Noyes, and assuming that one of those three (which is the only one of the three who is proved, if you take his alleged statement unsigned and repudiated as proof, to have cast a Doyle ballot) is one of the number who voted the Doyle ballots produced, that proof does not prove anything beyond the act of a single voter—does not prove that any other Doyle ballot was put into the ballot box with any evil intent.

Of course the burden of proof is not sustained by mere evidence that raises a suspicion. The definition of burden of proof given in the second volume American and English Encyclopedia of Law, page 649, is:

The obligation imposed upon a party who alleges the existence of a fact or thing necessary in the prosecution or defense of an action, to establish it by proof.

Volume 7 of the same Encyclopedia, at page 95, lays down the doctrine that—

If the commission of a crime is directly in issue in any proceeding, criminal or civil, it must be proved beyond reasonable doubt. The burden of proving that any person has been guilty of a crime or wrongful act is on the person who asserts it.

The court of appeals of New York, in the case of Morris et al. vs. Talcott, 96 N. Y., 100, said, at page 107:

A party therefore relying upon the establishment of a cause of action or a right to a remedy against another based upon the alleged commission of a fraud by such person must show affirmatively facts and circumstances necessarily tending to establish the probability of guilt. In order to maintain his claim. When the evidence is capable of an interpretation which makes it equally as consistent with the innocence of the accused party as with that of his guilt, that meaning must be ascribed to it which accords with his innocence, rather than that which imputes to him a criminal intent.

In an action to recover damages for alleged false representations in the sale of certain stock (Hatch against Spooner, 37 New York State Reports, 151) the general term first department said, page 156, after citing the above case:

In cases of this description fraud must be established by evidence necessarily leading to that conclusion. If an inference consistent with innocence may be deduced from the proofs, such inference must be drawn as matter of law, and a jury can not be permitted to speculate upon the question as to whether fraud did or did not exist.

The rule therefore in New York is very strict. The burden being upon Rockwell to show that the Doyle ballots were cast by bribed voters, he must sustain that burden by positive evidence necessarily leading to that conclusion, or else he must fail in his case.

If it be argued that the demand for strict common-law evidence of the actual bribery of the voter before the rejection of his vote is to be had puts too great a task upon Mr. Rockwell, and if it be urged that it is extremely difficult to produce the identical voter and induce him to testify that he cast a particular ballot and was bribed to do so, it is a perfect answer to say that for years the courts in Canada have been demanding and receiving just exactly this sort of evidence.

All the elections to the Canadian Parliament are now subject to review by their courts. It is now some time since it was reported that eleven Conservatives and eight Liberals had been turned out of the present Canadian Parliament as the result of contests carried on in their courts. In Canada the identical voter who was bribed to vote is put upon the stand and makes the contestant's case. The statutes of New York are framed to encourage the freedom of such a witness in a New York contest. Chapter 94 of the laws of 1890, under which law this election was held, after fixing the penalties for buying votes at section 41, and the penalty for selling votes or accepting bribes at section 41 a, says at section 41 c:

A person offending against any provision of sections 41 and 41a, in this act, is a competent witness against another person so offending, and may be compelled to attend and testify upon any trial, hearing, proceeding, or investigation, in the same manner as any other person, but the testimony so given shall not be used in any prosecution or proceeding, civil or criminal, against the person so testifying. A person so testifying shall not thereafter be liable to indictment, prosecution, or punishment for the offense with reference to which his testimony was given, and may plead or prove the giving of testimony accordingly, in bar of such an indictment or prosecution.

While, therefore, the burden was upon Mr. Rockwell to prove, if it were a fact, that the Doyle ballots were cast by bribed voters, the law gave him every opportunity to sustain that burden. The bribed voter could in this case, as in the Canadian cases, have freely and fearlessly testified to the facts, and the United States statutes gave to Mr. Rockwell the power by subpoena to compel the attendance of such witness, enforced by punishment in the United States courts if the witness refused to testify. In face of the aid which the criminal statutes of the State of New York proffered to Mr. Rockwell, and the aid which the statutes of the United States proffered him, if he was not willing to undertake to sustain the burden of proof cast upon him, or if undertaking it, he failed in the attempt, no one can logically charge that Mr. Noyes occupies any technical position when he stands upon his rights as an American citizen, to say that the certificate of his election which the court of appeals awarded him has not been successfully attacked by Mr. Rockwell.

Mr. GILLESPIE obtained the floor and said: I yield for a moment to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. O'FERRALL].

Mr. O'FERRALL. Mr. Speaker, it is agreed that all discussion on this case shall be concluded this evening except the remarks which the gentleman from New York [Mr. FELLOWS] and myself may desire to submit to-morrow. The gentleman from New York will speak then, and I will conclude the discussion. That is the agreement that has been arrived at.

Mr. CAMINETTI. I object.

Mr. O'FERRALL (not hearing the objection). And at the expiration of my remarks I shall move the previous question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. COMPTON). Objection is made by the gentleman on the right.

Mr. O'FERRALL. Who objects?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California [Mr. CAMINETTI].

Mr. O'FERRALL. Well then, Mr. Speaker, I give notice now that on to-morrow, after I conclude my remarks, I shall move the previous question. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FELLOWS] will precede me to-morrow morning; and I will close the debate.

Mr. GILLESPIE. Mr. Speaker, I realize the difficulty of saying anything at this time that will be of interest to this House in connection with the pending case, but I feel it to be my duty as a member of the Committee on Elections to express my reasons for having been in part responsible for the minority report before this body. To my mind there is no intricate question of law involved here, nor any conflict of testimony that will embarrass anyone in the consideration of the case. The trouble, I fear, in the discussion is that we have wandered into the byways, not sticking close enough to the law of the case.

The gentleman from Wisconsin who preceded me thought it was true that the proceeding in the courts in New York had concluded our investigations here. I think not. I will differ with the gentleman, and I will call his attention to the very last words in the prevailing opinion, in the proceedings in the courts of New York, wherein they expressly say they have not determined the very question that we are here to determine, and that is who is actually elected a member of Congress from the Twenty-eight district of the State of New York? The proceeding in the New York courts is, as any legal mind will comprehend, a very narrow proceeding. It was a mandamus proceeding. It was a mandate, or writ, from a superior court to an inferior tribunal, directing that they should do a certain thing. What was it? It was to take into consideration certain statements that they had passed upon before. They did that. They concluded their duties, and that was the end of that proceeding.

Now, then, sir, we come to the real question here involved. Who is actually elected as the member to represent that district in this Congress? The majority report say that the contestant, Mr. Noyes, had a clear majority of 6 votes. Mr. Speaker, if he has a clear majority of the legal votes in that district he ought to be seated. He ought to be seated regardless of any feeling and regardless of every feeling, if that assertion be true. I would ask this House in behalf of this case to do its whole duty, to do it fairly, to do it honestly, and then we will have done our part of the duty devolved upon us, and until then we will not have done it.

Now, sir, what is the first question that is raised? If this man has not a clear majority of 6, has he any majority, or is the contestee, Mr. Rockwell, entitled to the seat by reason of having a clear majority on his part? That depends upon three propositions which must be considered.

First, was the will of the people in the third district of the Fifth ward, city of Elmira—although I may possibly be mistaken in that—was their will, as they expressed it at the ballot box in that election, announced? If it was not announced or truly announced, it is the duty of this court to record it as they wished it to be recorded. It is true that on the night of the election in the third district, Fifth ward, there was a clerical error made in tabulating the returns. It is true that the board reported on the face of the returns that Mr. Rockwell had received 87 votes and that Mr. Noyes had received 72 votes. But it is true, as a matter of fact that is uncontroverted in the record, that on that night the same board discovered the fact that 94 votes had been given for Mr. Rockwell and 66 for Mr. Noyes, or a difference of 14 in favor of Mr. Rockwell, which overcomes all that is claimed by the majority. That is one ground, and it has been so thoroughly discussed concerning the evidence that I will not further refer to it.

Now I come to another point, the marked ballots; and I will state this as a leading proposition, as my belief, and that is that when a statute prohibits a certain thing to be done, and if I do that prohibited act, the act itself is void. That is the law. That is now the law, has always been the law, as it is now and always will be, notwithstanding the gentleman's opinion that he speaks from Colorado or any other court. At least I am convinced that that is the law and will retain my opinion.

Now, then, let us understand about these marked ballots. Because a ballot is marked, the simple marking of it does not invalidate it. It is not under the law of New York a fact that because a ballot is marked it must be thrown out. That is not the law. Just as I said a moment ago, we have been drifting off into the byways concerning the New York law. Let us stop and see what the law itself provides. It is plain, unequivocal, and easily understood. It does not require a legal mind to construe it. It says:

No voter shall place any mark upon his ballot by means of which it can be identified as the one voted by him.

That is plain. Any man can understand it. Therefore, if the 28 ballots that are spoken of were marked as stated, and could be identified as the ballot of any particular man, and it was properly in the record—and for the sake of argument I will concede that it is properly there, although, as a matter of fact, it is not—but if any one of these 28 ballots or a number of them could be identified as the ballots cast by any individual they ought to go out, and I would vote to exclude them. But they say, "Why will you insist on retaining the 28 ballots, and ask to have the 16 known as the 'Doyle ballots' thrown out?" For the very reverse of the proposition; for the very reason that the 16 ballots can be identified as the ballots cast by particular individuals.

There is the distinction between the two classes of marked ballots. One has a mark by means of which it can be identified as the one voted by a particular person, and the other has not. That is not hard to understand. That is why I say, as a legal conclusion, that the 28 ballots can not go out under any circumstance whatever; and I say that under the same law the 16 ballots will go out; and I have given my reasons. Is there one of the 16 ballots that could not be identified as the ballot of some particular individual? A certain individual voted "A," and a certain other individual voted "B;" but tell me, will you, how one of the 28 voters of the 28 series of ballots can tell which one of the 28 he voted? The absurdity of such a thing is brought out in a question that was asked in this House, and that was, "Suppose I mark my ballot so that I might identify it, and I put it in the box, will it be thrown out?"

Then he follows with another question: "Suppose my neighbor marks his ballot just exactly like mine, will his ballot go out?"

Why, no; for the very reason that neither he nor his neighbor could then tell which one he had voted. But suppose that the gentleman should vote a ticket marked "A. Doyle," and his neighbor should vote a ticket marked "B. Doyle." Could they not identify them? And if a ballot is designated with a mark by means of which it can be identified as the one voted by a particular person, it comes within the letter and the spirit of the law and goes out.

Now, there is another reason why this contestee should retain his seat. It has been spoken of lightly. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DE FOREST] told this House that there was not a lawyer who, under the evidence concerning bribery and conspiracy, would go before a court and argue it. Let me say to him that I am a lawyer, and I will go before this court or I will go before any court, and I will say to him that under the same evidence, without contradiction, if he has any interest in the result he had better get out from under it.

I charge, Mr. Speaker, that a man by the name of Mongin, a man by the name of Harmon, and a man by the name of McArthur entered into a conspiracy; that upon that day they were acting in concert, for a common purpose, and that common purpose was the bribery of voters; and I believe I can convince you of it. I will concede the fact that bribery and fraud are hard to establish, for several reasons. One reason in particular is that the best proof lies in the breasts of the participants. Therefore the law in its wisdom opens wide the door and allows parties to bring in all the circumstances and prove all the little details; and from the circumstances they build up conclusions; and that is the only way it can be done in that class of cases.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is an admitted fact that every one of these Doyle ballots was in the handwriting of one Duncan McArthur, who, as I say, is one of the conspirators, who lives in one ward, while the other two conspirators live in another ward, just across the highway. Now, let us see who these individuals are. Duncan McArthur is a committeeman, perhaps a ward politician. Mr. Mongin belongs to a reputable firm of business gentlemen, Sweet, Mongin & Cook; a man in high standing, he thinks, no doubt. As a matter of fact, he is a man of means. Mr. Harmon, the other conspirator, keeps an unlicensed whisky shop in the town. There are the three individuals who conspired together to purchase votes in the interest of Col. Noyes.

On pages 50, 51, and 52 of the record will be found the testimony of Edward Nugent, wherein he swears that Mongin, McArthur, and Harmon were ardent, active supporters of Col. Noyes. On page 68 Charles T. Andrews swears that Mr. Mongin was a heavy contributor to the cause of Noyes. Now, that is the situation of the parties in this contest. How do we get them together? Let me show you. On pages 58 and 59 Charles H. Leddick swears that it was common rumor then and thereafter that this man Mongin had bought Harmon, and that Harmon had bought Democrats. He further tells you that this reputable gentleman, Mr. Mongin, upon the morning of election is found in this disreputable place in consultation with Mr. Harmon. He tells you, too, that they went behind the refrigerator and that they had a close, secret conference there, and that standing there was a man by the name of Abram D. Sheradin. Sheradin follows with his testimony, and he tells you that immediately Andy Harmon bought his vote for the sum of $2.

What were they talking about? What were Mr. Mongin and Mr. Harmon there for? Simply to seize this man and buy him, as the evidence shows, and that evidence is uncontradicted. Now, there are two of the conspirators together. How about the third? Jacob Attinger, on page 80, says that he went into Andy Harmon's on election day; that he saw Andy Harmon have a large roll of bills, something unusual, and he said to him, "Andy, is there anything in it," and Andy said, "Yes, but you vote in the Third ward, and you will have to go and see Duncan McArthur." Duncan McArthur was the third conspirator. What would he have to go and see Duncan McArthur for? Why would that follow the inquiry "Is there anything in it?"

"Yes, there is something in it, but you must go and see Duncan McArthur." And what? Now, we are at McArthur. On page 74 Calvin Green testifies, and they did not dare cross-examine him on the witness stand. He tells you that he sold his vote to Duncan McArthur on that day for $2. How did he get it? He went to Duncan McArthur, who took him around the corner of the engine house and had some conversation with him, and said to him, "Here is a ticket, a Noyes ticket. You vote that and I will make it right with you to-night." Did he do it? That very evening he gave the voter $2. Why did he wait until night? Was he suspicious of his customers? Was he afraid the man he was buying would not deliver the goods? Did it occur to his mind, "Here, I will give you a Doyle ballot and if that Doyle ballot comes out, I will give you $2, and if it does not I will not."

Ollie Ferris is another witness, and the gentlemen of the majority have taken the trouble to copy his testimony entirely into their report. They ought to have copied the other I have referred to. I will dismiss Ollie Ferris with simply one word, and that is that he sold his vote to Duncan McArthur and got his price. Did Mr. Mongin buy anybody? Indirectly he bought the vote of a strange man. In the testimony of young Warren it said he bought an unknown man's vote upon election day. He said to the young man, "Here's a roll of bills. You take it up and hand it to that man. Tell him that Mongin sent it." That is the way to work on election day. Do it through somebody else, so that you will not be found out. Mongin was afraid, and so he did it through another person. To say the least, it was a very suspicious circumstance.

Now, then, Mr. Speaker, the strong evidence as to the truth of that is the fact that it is not denied. Mr. Mongin never has opened his mouth. Mr. McArthur, who stands, charged with bribery, has never opened his mouth. The only man who has is a man that the majority say is a Democratic renegade. And how did he do it? Immediately after the election a local paper, which is edited by a man by the name of Stahl, wrote an article and inserted it in his paper, and in that article he charged that Andrew Harmon had sold himself to the Republican party.

He furthermore charged, that on the day following the election he doffed his threadbare, shiny suit and appeared in a brand new McKinley suit with Noyes's name on the collar. [Laughter.] Following the publication of that article came a libel suit. Mr. Harmon concluded that there was some defamation in that article, and he sued Mr. Stahl for damages. What followed? Under the statutes of New York it was necessary that Mr. Stahl should go into court and file what is called "an affidavit of defense," and he must file that instrument under oath, and he did it. And what did he say? Did he say "I did not mean to harm you, I take it all back?" No, sir. He said: "What I said of you, Mr. Harmon, is true; and more than that is true. You not only sold yourself to the Republican party, but you bought Democrats. You conspired with others to buy Democrats, and you did it."

That affidavit is on file, and it is under oath of the editor of that paper. That makes the issue between the parties, and they go to trial. It is put regular upon the trial list. It got to trial. That day Mr. Stahl, the editor, with his counsel and his witnesses are there. Mr. Harmon is not there. A verdict, or decree of the court against him is made for $69.94 costs. That is what it cost Mr. Harmon to make this effort to establish his good character.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I will not detain the House but a few minutes longer. I want to say this, that it is the law, as old as laws are, that if a man is confronted with a proposition that is derogatory to his character, or anything against his honor, or against even his honesty in any way, and he does not refute it, then it is a circumstance that may be proved as of weight against his defense, and assists in the establishment of the claims against him. I have read this record, and have read it carefully. I have gone over and over it, and I have concluded against the interest of the contestant; but before I concluded I consulted the law that I might be sure, and I will read it to you:

When evidence of bribery by an active supporter of the respondent is given the court will draw an unfavorable conclusion from the neglect or refusal of the person so charged to explain his conduct in the witness box.

That is the conclusion of the law and that is the conclusion I come to because it is the law, and because I have come to that conclusion I intend to vote for the contestee, believing that he has been honestly and fairly elected a member of this House. If the time has come when you will throw open the doors of Congress to the Representative of bribe-givers and bribe-takers, then open another door that honest men may go out; for, with the coming of such a time comes danger if not fatality to the institutions of this Government. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WIKE. Mr. Speaker, it will not be necessary for me to review the canvass of votes in either of the counties or any of the districts involved here in order to present to the House the view of this case that I am disposed to take, and shall detain the House for only a brief time because I can set forth the reasons that have led me to my conclusion without, as I hope, being tedious. I desire to address myself particularly to those who differ from me in the opinion they hold of this case, and, perhaps in the vote that they will finally give upon the determination of it, because I desire they and all the members of the House should be put in possession of the reasons which have influenced me in coming to the conclusions at which I have arrived.

I judge from the faces of those around me, as well as from the absence of so many usually seen here, that a conclusion has probably been already reached in the minds of most of the members of the House, and therefore I feel that I am simply putting on record the reasons that have influenced my own mind and lead me to the support of the report of the majority of the committee. I am not willing to believe, although I have heard it jocularly suggested that the margin is so small between the contestant's vote and the vote of the contestee that the simple matter of prejudice ought to be sufficient to overcome it. In addressing so responsible a body as this, of course I refer to such an idea merely as a suggestion which finds expression in a jocular sense.

Mr. Speaker, if the lex talionis could be applied in this case and save the consciences of the men who apply it in removing a majority of only 6, it might perhaps very well be applied by this side for the offense committed in the last House in removing majorities of thousands without law or justice, but I deign to consider that view further than to say that if it is merely a naked excuse that is sought for keeping the contestee in his seat that possibly might be found in the record of the testimony in the case. Let me say, however, to you, Mr. Speaker, and to this House, that it is not a sufficient answer to the objections to such a course to say that the other side of the House in the last Congress sought an excuse to override a majority, not of 6, but of 10,000. Yes, as suggested by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MARTIN], 13,000. I want to impress upon the minds of those who may hear me that if there is any difference it ought to be in favor of a very careful and conscientious consideration of the question presented in this case when it is to be determined upon such a small margin as the one involved in the matter before us.

Let me say further to my Democratic friends that it ought not to be even intimated in argument, either in this House or out of it, that our Republican friends have done in the last Congress that which lets down the bars for our action in this case. It is not simply the seating of one of the parties to this contest that is involved, it is not simply the dignity of this House, but the people have an interest in the determination of this question and they demand of us a conscientious examination of the case and a conscientious application of the rules of law and justice in its determination, unbiased by prejudice or partisan considerations.

If I wanted any evidence of the fact that the people not only were interested, but that they took an active interest in the manner and result of these contest proceedings, I would point to the results which followed from the wanton disregard of law and justice in dealing with the seats of members in the last House, and I warn you, my fellow Democrats, on this floor, from inviting the curse on your party the Republicans of the last House called down on theirs, by the shameful denial of the right of the majority in so many districts, to be represented in the National Legislature. While many questions contributed to swell the overwhelming majority that returned the unprecedented majority to this House in the election of 1890, yet I conceive that no one question was so potent in producing those results as the unwarrantable action of the Republicans of the last House in unseating numerous lawfully elected members for the notorious purpose of giving them a working majority, excepting only the question of tariff reform.

Passing from these matters, I call attention now to a most remarkable circumstance in this case, as shown by the record. Not merely a circumstance either, but a very weighty and important, if not a controlling, fact. The argument and contention now made to sustain the cause of the contestee is based almost exclusively upon the fact of the discovery of the "Doyle" ballots so called, which are claimed to be marked ballots. The remarkable thing about this is that this contention seems to be entirely an afterthought of the contestee and his attorneys in the case. The record discloses that the contestee has the certificate of election and holds his seat here against and in defiance of a line of decisions in the supreme court of New York at its special term and again at its general term, and finally in the court of appeals, which is the highest court in the State.

The board of canvassers in five districts, by a recount that has been fully and sufficiently considered in this discussion, reversed the result of the election as shown by the first canvass and gave a majority to the contestee. Mr. Noyes, the contestant, who was shown upon the face of the returns to have been elected, brought a suit in the supreme court of New York to compel the board of canvassers to count and return the votes as indicated on the face of the returns, and which showed a majority for the contestant.

These courts, all Democratic, sustained the application of the contestant and directed the board of canvassers to disregard the recount and canvass, and return only the votes shown from the face of the returns. That canvass was finally made and showed the contestant Noyes was entitled to the seat, but in the mean time, before the final decision of the court of appeals was rendered in June, 1891, but after the first one had been announced by the supreme court, Mr. Rockwell had procured his certificate of election from the State authorities at Albany, on which he has been admitted to his seat.

The recount having been thus annulled and set aside by the highest judicial authorities in the State of New York because it was unlawful and made without authority, the original grounds for claiming and holding the seat, has been wholly abandoned by the contestee, and he rests his case now on the subsequent discovery of the Doyle, or "marked" ballots as he calls them.

The supreme court annihilated the contention that the recount gave any color to Mr. Rockwell's claim of election and knocked the props from under his line of defense to the contestant's case; and consequently he shifted it to a reliance on the objections insisted upon as to the Doyle ballots, which otherwise would never have been thought of.

If the courts decided the case correctly, and they were practically unanimous, then there was nothing left of the original claim that Mr. Rockwell made to the certificate and to the seat, and those lawyers who make a different contention can not be sincere. It is too plain a case thus far for legal doubt, or even, so to speak, for legal quibbles.

I will not, therefore, discuss at length the legality of that recount; it has been sufficiently considered in this debate to show that the court was clearly right, if that was at all necessary. There is hardly a pretext made in earnestness now that there was any legality or justice or honesty in it, because the law required the ballots to be destroyed on the canvass and promulgation of the vote on the night of the election and before the board of canvassers adjourned. After the board had adjourned there is abundance of authority to show that any additional act by it would be functus officio, and it could proceed no farther in the matter of canvassing the votes. If there were clerical defects or errors in the certificates or in matters of form, the clerk or canvassers might supply omissions or make corrections, but as to farther canvassing the vote or determining the result their powers were at an end. But these questions relating to the recount are res adjudicata, as I repeat again having been decided by the highest judicial authority of the State of New York, and we, as Democrats, should bow to such determination.

So this contest was at an end, if it had been left there. There was nothing else disclosed in the answer of Mr. Rockwell to contestant's case, except the charge of bribery; and not a word of reference is made in that answer to the claim that there were any marked ballots in question at all. No mention or allusion is made of the Doyle ballots. They were never thought of, as I contend, until after the questions of the recount were decided by the supreme court against the contestee.

But while these matters were being determined, the contestee had, as I have stated, under the machinery of New York politics, procured his certificate, which under the decisions cited he never should, nor could have secured. Consequently, having abandoned all claim under that recount, he occupies here the position which Mr. Noyes ought to occupy: Mr. Rockwell ought to be the contestant in this case, in order that the real attitude and rights of the parties could be more easily and properly understood.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. The gentleman is mistaken in saying that any claim on the part of the contestee under the recount has been abandoned; nothing has been abandoned.

Mr. WIKE. The real right to the certificate in this case is to be determined by the official count, not by a recount of ballots, the boxes containing which had been broken open and, as it has been proved, tampered with, and the recounts made forty-eight hours after the official count had been completed and declared. How can gentlemen contend that men whose official authority had thus expired could reassemble and revivify the board that had by law ceased to exist and recount ballots that the law expressly provides should have been destroyed on the night after the election? How can we rely upon a recount of that kind, surrounded with all the possibilities of fraud and corruption, that have been shown to surround the ballots in question and offer that result to us instead of the original returns, as evidence of the result of the election, and should we accept it, because otherwise we decide against the interests of one of our political friends? If gentlemen have not abandoned the recount they ought, in common honesty to have done so, and as I insist they did do.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Will the gentlemen please explain any infirmity in the count in the third district, Fifth ward, where there was no recount—where they counted the ballots and wrote out the returns and pasted the ballots on the outside on the night of the election? This election district is not affected by the decision of the supreme court. The decision expressly confines its rulings to the other five election districts.

Mr. WIKE. I am not able to answer the gentleman in reference to that particular district, for I have not the part of the record relating to it before me or in my mind.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. The supreme court says, page 182:

In our opinion the statement in the body of the paper as to the votes for Congress in the five districts made on the night after the election must control.

They expressly refrain from any decision as to the sixth district or the third district of the Fifth ward.

Mr. WIKE. I do not care to have the gentleman make his argument now. He has already had the floor, and will have it again, I presume.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. No; I shall not have it again. That third district, Fifth ward, is decisive of this case—

Mr. WIKE. I do not so understand it, by any means.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Because it makes a difference of 14 votes. In that district the work was completed on the night of the election, at least as to one return.

Mr. WIKE. By the count as made by both sides of the committee this case rests substantially upon the validity or invalidity of the Doyle ballots—16 in number.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Oh, no.

Mr. WIKE. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe it necessary to discuss before this House any further the validity of that recount, because it is literally annihilated by the courts of New York—and Democratic courts at that. For once we can not complain that our Republican friends stole a march on us there, and we should show our consistency by standing at last by our own courts.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. But the court excluded that district from the decision.

Mr. WIKE. I understand perfectly well that the court excluded nothing. It simply directed the board of canvassers to canvass that vote, not by what the recount might show, but what the statement on the face of the returns showed the vote to be when the polls closed. The court held that the canvass which was to prevail was the canvass made according to law, not one made one or two days after the election in violation of law, when, according to the provisions of the law, the ballots should have been destroyed at the close of the polls by the board before it adjourned.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. The decision of the court was confined to five districts: this third district, Fifth ward, was not embraced in the decision. The court made a decision as to five districts, but not as to the other; and this other, which is not touched by the decision of the court, should be decisive of this case.

Mr. WIKE. As I have indicated, the claim on which Mr. Rockwell holds his seat is based upon the recount; and when a final decision was made upon that question against him, he then sought to occupy some other ground.

I am not sufficiently familiar with the practice prevailing before the Committee on Elections to determine how or why they finally concluded that there was sufficient in the answer of the contestee to permit him to go into the question of the Doyle ballots.

There is not a syllable in his answer that claims that there were any marked ballots. Contestee simply claims that there were $10,000 put into the hands of Republican managers, and that it was used for the purpose of bribery, which has no proof to sustain it; but I will read the language in that particular of the answer itself:

With the intent and purpose to bribe the electors in said counties who would otherwise have voted for the said Hosea H. Rockwell, to vote for the said Henry T. Noyes for said office at said election and to refrain from voting for the said Hosea H. Rockwell for said office at said election, and that other and additional large sums of money were paid and contributed by other persons with the intent and purpose last aforesaid, and that the sums of money paid and contributed as aforesaid were used, employed, and paid by the said Henry T. Noyes and his personal and political friends to a great number of voters in said counties comprising said Twenty-eighth Congressional district to induce such voters to vote for the said Henry T. Noyes for said office or to refrain from voting for the said Hosea H. Rockwell for said office or to induce such voters to come to the polls or to remain away from the polls at such election, and large sums of such money were also paid to many of said voters as a consideration for and on account of such voters having refrained from voting for said Hosea H. Rockwell or having voted for said Henry T. Noyes, or both, or having come to the polls or remained away from the polls at such election.

There is not the slightest reference to any marked ballots, or to the Doyle ballots anywhere to be found in the answer. But these gentlemen do charge now, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. MAGNER], in his very able speech last evening, told us it was perfectly admissible to come in here and show after the first case had all vanished into thin air that under that clause of this answer which I have just read it was competent and proper to allow the contestee to come in and point out that there were certain marked ballots voted, and that these marked ballots, being the Doyle ballots, changed the result of the election. I am not sufficiently acquainted with the practice before the committee, as I have stated, to see how it is possible to permit such a change in the issues without amending the pleadings; but the result is, at all events, that these gentlemen have shifted their position from the recount, and placed it on the new discovery of the Doyle ballots, which they claim were marked ballots, and cast by bribed voters. Now, there are two branches to that case as newly presented. Were they marked ballots, or were they cast by bribed voters?

A MEMBER. Both.

Mr. WIKE. Both. Very well. Now, they can not rely on the one branch of this case to establish the other. It may be that both assertions are true, but there must be sufficient proof to sustain either of the allegations independently of the other. One does not necessarily depend on the other. And I would like to have the attention of the gentleman from New York if present, for I desire him to answer now whether he conceives it would have made any difference as to the character of the ballot if the names A. Doyle, B. Doyle, C. Doyle, and so on had been printed in them; whether in his judgment they would have been marked ballots in that event without these names being inserted with a lead pencil or without the erasure of Earl's name? He would say no, I presume, and that it would make no difference.

The simple fact that the name of "A. Doyle" being written instead of printed, could not make any difference as to its being a marked ballot. It certainly can not as to these ballots. That these were all fraudulent ballots then rest on a single question, and that is that there is some proof to show that the man who wrote the names there had been trying to buy votes and probably did buy one or two. There is not a scrap of evidence that he ever bought or offered to buy any of the voters of the Doyle ballots except what Ferris says about his own.

That is the most that can be said in reference to it. I would ask the gentleman from Virginia, the chairman of the committee, which of the Doyle ballots Mr. Ferris voted?

Mr. O'FERRALL. He did not know whether it was an A. Doyle or C. Doyle or D. Doyle or any other Doyle.

Mr. WIKE. Very well. Then there is no testimony to impeach any of the Doyle ballots. However, as the argument has proceeded on that ground, let us suppose that it was the A. Doyle ballot. The testimony of Ferris is set out in the record, and they claim it supports the allegations of fraud in this case as to the Doyle ballots, but I do not believe that if property to the value of a nickel was at stake on the strength of this testimony, that you would give it any weight whatever, much less to take such testimony in support of a claim for the seat of a member of Congress. But not only that, the rights of the people are involved in this controversy and are made to depend on his testimony. Read what he says and how he says it. It is set forth here in the record. You are familiar with it, and I will not take the time of the House to read it. But on that testimony alone they say that McArthur had not only bought Ferris's vote; and his testimony did not pretend to relate to any other, but that he had bought the votes of the 15 other voters of the Doyle ballots—a most violent presumption indeed!

Now I wish to call attention to what the minority say in their report, and which is indisputably the law of the case. It is an admission which it occurs to me entirely disposes of the case so far as the fraud is concerned. They say:

Indeed the contestant does not pretend that these ballots should not be counted.

That is with reference to the 28 marked ballots cast and counted for Rockwell.

As he says in his brief he only calls attention to that to show that the Doyle ballots should not be excluded. This evidence may, perhaps raise a suspicion of wrongdoing. But suspicion of fraud does not establish it.

Hearken to that language. That is what the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. COBB], who spoke yesterday, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GILLESPIE], who has just taken his seat, say in their report, namely: that the suspicion of fraud does not establish it. But they go on to say:

If the circumstances in regard to the Doyle ballots considered apart from the influence of the New York statutes go no further than to raise a suspicion they should not be excluded.

Now, I insist that all that this evidence possibly can do is simply to raise a suspicion that McArthur might have bought other votes.

It is further contended, however, as I infer from an interrogatory by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER], addressed very pertinently to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MAGNER] yesterday afternoon, and an inquiry by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], that a ballot should not be counted if the effect of casting it would be to send the voter to the penitentiary or subject him to fine and imprisonment. The authority that Mr. RAYNER read was simply to the effect that if the statute fixed a penalty to voting such a ballot then, that that fact should exclude the ballot so voted. That is not the law as interpreted by the supreme court of Texas. A decision of that court was read yesterday to countervail that position and the authority read by the gentleman from Maryland. And I will read it again, because it is worthy of consideration in this connection. It will be for some person better versed in these matters than I pretend to be to determine which is right, but at all events it is not controlling.

The court say:

We think it plain that inasmuch as the statute which fixes a penalty for marking a ballot does not expressly declare that a marked ballot shall be thrown out * * * the board erred in rejecting the vote of this county upon this ground.

When the law does not require a ballot to be thrown out because it is marked it will not be disregarded though a penalty is fixed for voting it.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. What is that case?

Mr. WIKE. I quote from the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. O'FERRALL], the chairman of the committee, and you will find it on page 3823 of the RECORD. It is the case of McKenzie vs. Braxton. I have not the volume of the report at hand.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I know the gentleman wants to be correct. I have the case in my hand. It has been paraded in this House as an authority, and it is no authority at all.

Mr. WIKE. I will leave that to the House. I do not want the gentleman from Alabama to discuss it in my time.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Will you read the opinion, then?

Mr. WIKE. As the gentleman manifests so much zeal I will permit him to read it himself.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I will read from the original report in the case of Giddings vs. Clark. This was a case in which ballots were rejected:

By reference to the statute here referred to it will be seen that it is made a misdemeanor for any judge of election to place any number or mark upon the ticket of any voter, but it is not declared that the vote of a legally qualified voter shall be rejected because his ballot is marked by the judges. We should not be inclined to put a construction upon this statute which would enable an officer of election to destroy the effect of a ballot cast in good faith by a legal voter by placing a number or mark upon it. A ballot may be thus marked or numbered without the knowledge or consent of the voter.

These ballots were marked by the judges after they had been voted, and this decision does not apply to the case we are discussing.

Mr. WIKE. I do not want the gentleman to read that whole opinion. It will take too much time.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama (continuing).

and it would be manifestly unjust that he should in this way be deprived of his vote.

That is the case of Giddings vs. Clark; and the case of McKenzie vs. Braxton that they parade here is exactly the same. I will read that now. [Laughter.]

The decision then says:

This precise point was decided in the late case of McKenzie vs. Braxton, already quoted from, and in which the committee use the following language: "In Virginia the law which was in force until near the time of the election required the ballots to be numbered. A short time prior to the election in question this provision was repealed. It seems that at a few precincts the officers of election were not advised of this repeal, and consequently numbered the ballots as they had been in the habit of doing before."

That is the whole substance of it. The election officers marked them, and that decision says properly that the man should not be deprived of his vote, and that decision is paraded here as an authority in this case.

Mr. WIKE. They say this: That a mark put on the ballot by another person than the voter himself would not invalidate the ballot, and in the case we are considering of the Doyle ballots there is no pretense that the voter marked them, if they were in fact marked.

A MEMBER. What authority is that?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. An authority they have been parading here all day.

Mr. WIKE. Mr. Speaker, the decision applies as much to this case as to the one to which the gentleman seeks to apply it. I took the extract as I found it in the speech of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. O'FARRALL] and read it from his speech of the other day. It is to the effect that a mark upon a ballot, not made by the voter himself does not invalidate the ballot; and it is in evidence here that the voters did not mark the Doyle ballots, but that McArthur wrote the name of Doyle in the ballots, which is all the marking on them that is claimed, and there is not a scintilla of evidence here before this House that either the man Ferris or any of the fifteen others who voted Doyle ballots, either marked them or knew they were marked for the purposes of identification. There is not a pretext that anybody else had ever heard of the ballots being so marked, or knew anything about them.

Admitting now that the proper test is that if the evidence before us were sufficient to send the voters of the Doyle ballots, or some of them, to the penitentiary or to imprisonment for voting an unlawful ballot, then these ballots, or so many of them as were voted by such voters, ought to be excluded. But there is no pretense here that the evidence before us would even tend to convict any voter of any of these ballots, with the possible exception of Ferris. I will ask every lawyer within the sound of my voice to place himself upon (in imagination) the bench and imagine that he is called upon by the contestee to instruct the jury before whom, we will suppose, these sixteen voters who cast the Doyle ballots are on trial for having sold their votes, or for having unlawfully marked their ballots. The instruction called for is in substance that "the evidence" now before us "tending to convict Mr. Ferris of having unlawfully sold his vote is sufficient, in the opinion of the court, and the jury are so instructed—to convict the other fifteen men of bribery, and that they should convict them accordingly!" Why, the contestee would be laughed out of court. Such a case could have no standing. What becomes of the test therefore that if the evidence is sufficient to convict the voter then these ballots should be rejected. The inference is that if the evidence is not sufficient to convict, if it is not sufficient to imprison, then the ballots ought to be admitted and counted.

I am speaking now of the question of fraud. These gentlemen making the minority report say that if the evidence in this case is not sufficient to raise a legal inference of fraud the mere suspicion is not sufficient to exclude these ballots; and to convict each voter the proof must be sufficient to show the criminal intent of each in the violation of the election laws of the State of New York.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. WIKE. Certainly.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Does the gentleman hold in a civil proceeding that it is necessary to prove fraud beyond a reasonable doubt?

Mr. WIKE. I am now answering the contention that you and your friends have made, that the voting of these ballots ought to send the voters to the penitentiary; that these ballots ought not to be counted, if the evidence in this case would convict the voter of a criminal offense, and I am trying to show that there can not be any reasonable pretext in the minds of any lawyer that there is sufficient evidence in this record upon which to found a legal presumption against the voters of any of these ballots. That is what I am seeking to do. It is an issue of your own making. I do not say that in a civil case it would require the same proof, but it would require proof of fraud, because, as every lawyer knows, there must be proof of fraud and that it will never be presumed under any circumstances without sufficient proof.

There is not a particle of testimony here against these voters, and there can not be, for they are not even known. The fact that McArthur has been convicted in your minds of having been engaged in the practice of buying other votes does not convict the voter of these ballots for having sold their votes. These ballots were all voted by Republicans. If the tickets voted had been Democratic tickets with Noyes's name upon them, and had been voted by Democrats, it would have created a stronger impression of fraud than is now presented. They were Republican tickets from the top to the bottom, with the exception of the name of Doyle. There was nothing strange that the name of Doyle should appear only on Republican tickets, for in fact in all human probability they were voted only by McArthur's friends, who was a Republican committeeman and an electioneer.

It is asked, however, what motive other than that of a fraudulent and dishonest one there could have been in placing the name of Doyle upon these ballots? My answer to that is that the criminality, if there was any connected with the marking and voting of these ballots, must be upon the part of the voter himself, and no matter what criminal intent some other person may have had in preparing the ticket it could not affect the voter unless he himself were connected with the criminality by some guilty knowledge or participation.

It is assumed with much positiveness that there could be no other possible motive in marking these ballots than in connection with some unlawful purpose. But I do not concede this, for it is quite evident to my mind that McArthur might have had a purpose in identifying these votes that would not in any way involve the voter in any unworthy motive, much less a criminal intent. For instance, McArthur might well have said to himself, "I want to preserve the evidence as to the tickets that I give out at this election," or "I wish to see if 16 persons who pretend to be Republicans, and vote the ticket straight, but of whom I have some doubts as to whether they really do in fact vote a straight ticket, as they pretend to me they do, or not;" and with this determination he inserts in these ballots the name of Doyle, as indicated in the ballots. He might then well say to each of these voters that "I would like you to do me the favor of voting for my friend Doyle to-day, as I wish to pay him a compliment, and you can do no possible good by voting for Earl, who is on both tickets and bound to be elected anyway."

Or, again, he might say to these voters who might be bosom friends of his, "I don't like Earl, for he is a Democrat and decided a suit against a friend of mine on account of political prejudice, and I want to give him a black eye by showing him that he can not get all the votes in this ward." And in consequence of the friendship between McArthur and the voter, the latter might well say, "It makes little difference to me, and if it will be any accommodation or satisfaction to you Mr. McArthur, I will vote for your friend Doyle," and proceeds to vote it accordingly.

I presume there could be no fraud or criminality imputed to the voter who was thus connected with the voting of the Doyle ballots. Is it not as reasonable to suppose some such innocent purpose on the part of the voter in casting these ballots as it is to presume without any evidence of the facts that he is a criminal that should be sentenced to the penitentiary or any other imprisonment? It is as easy to impute this honest motive to the voter as it is to impute a criminal intent, and it is not only the law and justice to presume that where an act may be susceptible of two constructions that the one should be given it which is in favor of innocence.

I think this answers the question as to what other possible motive there could be in voting these Doyle ballots than that of a criminal one, and illustrates the absurdity of jumping at the conclusion that the intent in voting these ballots must have necessarily been a fraudulent and criminal one on the part of the voter.

I am not trying to excuse or extenuate the acts or character of the man McArthur, who wrote the name of Doyle in these ballots. He ought perhaps to be convicted for bribery in connection with that election, and it would seem from the evidence that he ought, though not particularly or especially in the matter of the Doyle tickets. But I do not think it reasonable to convict of a crime sufficient to send to the penitentiary or other imprisonment the men who may have innocently received and voted the tickets that he (McArthur) had prepared, without a hearing, no matter what his (McArthur's) intent might have been in putting Doyle's name upon them.

It is not at all improbable that there are many voters in the city in which the Doyle ballots were cast, as they are in almost every other city of the same size in the country, who would care no more for Earl under such circumstances, or, for that matter, who might have no more knowledge of him than the man in the moon, nor than they had of the imaginary Doyle himself. To my mind it is not strange that 16, or twice that number, for that matter, might be found in such cities, who would just as soon, to accommodate a friend, and without reward or criminal intent, vote for a Doyle as for an Earl or any other person on the ticket in whom they were not particularly interested, and especially if such person stood in relation to the ticket as Earl did to the tickets voted on the day of the election in question.

As I have said, where you can give one of two interpretations to an act or condition of things, one that will imply guilt and the other innocence in relation to an individual, the interpretation that the law requires to be given is that the one which is consistent with innocence should be adopted instead of that which would imply guilt or criminality. In addition to the innocent instances I have given under which these ballots might have been cast, a dozen other equally as innocent reasons, I have no doubt, could be assigned, and as there is no evidence in this case to impute wrong to the voters of these ballots in the record, other than possibly to Farris, then, by all the rules of law, of justice, and propriety, as well as of decency, in fact, no wrongful imputation should be indulged as against the voters of at least 15 of the ballots in question.

So much for the fraud and criminality connected with the preparation and voting of the Doyle ticket. But it is said by those who advocate the retention of the contestee in the seat to which I think the contestant is entitled that the name written on the ticket is of a character to constitute it a marked ticket within the meaning of the statute, so as to exclude it from consideration in the canvass of the vote. And that raises the question whether the writing of a name in ink or with a pencil on the ticket of the person for whom the voter seeks to vote is any more of a "marking" of the ticket than it would be if the name were printed, which has already been discussed.

It is sufficient for me in this connection to call attention to what a dangerous state of affairs it would lead, to authorize the canvassers of the votes at an election to throw out all such votes as contained names that would enable them at their discretion to throw out of the count such as they might conclude of their own volition contained the names of fictitious persons, or persons who were not candidates, or whose names they might conclude were put on the ticket simply to mark them for purposes of identification. This would be a very dangerous and alarming power with which to clothe the canvassers of elections in these corrupt times. Of course where the law prohibits the counting of votes for persons not regularly nominated a different rule might apply, but it does not arise in this case.

A corrupt board of canvassers might easily say in counting the votes, "There is no such man as this; we do not know him. The voter did not intend to vote for this man, and he put his name on the ticket so as to mark it, and we will throw it out." That would never do. I contend these 16 voters had as good a right to mark the name of Doyle on their tickets in pencil themselves, or have others do so, and to vote them, as anybody would have had to vote a printed ticket with the name of Doyle printed upon it. So that it occurs to me there is nothing here which raises any presumption of fraud committed on the part of any of the 15 voters that could give the canvassers any pretext whatever to exclude them from the count on the ground that they were marked ballots or otherwise.

It is sought, however, to break the force of our contention for the application of the rule of the presumptions of innocence and honesty alluded to by the claim that the contestant should have called McArthur to explain these ballots and identify the voters of them; and gentlemen on the other side contend that it is a suspicious circumstance that McArthur was not called by the contestant.

Now, if there is so much in what McArthur knew about these pretended fraudulent votes, why did they not call him themselves? I do not know of anything that has shifted the burden of proof in this case except the fact, as I have tried to demonstrate, that the canvass made under the direction of the court of appeals of the State of New York in law and justice shifted that burden of proof from the contestant to the contestee, because it held in effect that the former was entitled to the certificate; so that whether you regard him as entitled to the certificate or not, one of these parties had just as much power and as much right and was under as much moral and legal obligation to call McArthur as the other.

But the contestee insists that he could not trust him, and God knows I would not, nor do I know who would; but of this there can be no doubt, the contestee might have called him as well as the contestant. What inference is to be drawn from the fact that he was not called? None on earth except that he was of such character that his testimony could not be relied upon for any purpose. It is a rule of law that the party calling a witness vouches for his credibility and can not contradict or impeach him if he swears falsely. So it is not strange then that the contestant should not choose to put himself in the power of a person guilty of bribery and who would perhaps be as ready to commit perjury as bribery.

A word now about the 23 marked ballots cast for the contestee. How did the contestee bear himself with reference to the charges and suspicion of fraud that attach to those ballots? I answer, in a way to excite and raise the gravest suspicion as to their honesty. The "Doyle" ballots, it will be remembered, were put into the box and canvassed and the return made without any exception being taken or protest made. Not so with these 23 marked ballots which went into the box in favor of the contestee. There was a protest against them then and there at the canvassing of the votes on the ground that they were marked ballots, contrary to law, and should be excluded from the count. "Ah, but," says the gentleman from Pennsylvania who has just taken his seat, "you could not identify those ballots." How does he know that? He says they are in the record far enough to be discussed, and he proceeds to consider what some one or two witnesses have said about them.

Now, if those ballots are far enough into the record of this case for him to discuss them, I may also be permitted to consider them. He says that judging from the evidence, those ballots could not identify the voters casting them. I do not know whether they could or not. The fact is that they are marked with three different figures, a "3," a "5," and an "8," as the evidence heard and as the record discloses, in the lower left-hand corner. Then there were counter check marks in pencil which may have been made in various shapes on the opposite corner diagonally. These marks are not very definitely described, but by means of a simple check mark you might indicate a dozen different persons or things, depending on the turn, form, size, or character of the mark. These marks, taken in combination with the figures in the case, might easily be made to identify 50 or 100 voters to one familiar with them or who held the proper key.

It is said there is no evidence of fraud here. I do not know. Why do we not know? I will tell the gentlemen. If they are content on the side of the contestee to discuss this testimony that came only partially into this record why did they not let all the testimony come in? The contestant tried to have this whole matter fully explained, and to show exactly what these characters were, and what they meant. The contestee, by his attorney, objected to that testimony. The contestant, called the Democratic inspectors as witnesses to testify. If there had been a fraud committed in the interest of the contestee who would be more likely to know better about it than Democrats? Who could know anything about it but Democrats? But when those Democratic witnesses were called, taking the cue from the objection or exception of the attorney for the contestee, they refused to testify, and stood dumb before the inquiry that sought to make plain the fraud involved in the cabalistic marks and characters. The Republican witnesses, not being so ready to accept the cue, did proceed, after the objection was made, to testify, but they said substantially that they did not know anything about the matter except, in a general way, that the ballots were marked in the manner I have stated, and why should they have known more.

But was it not rather a suspicious circumstance, to say the least, that the contestee here, by his attorney, refused to let Democratic witnesses, including the Democratic inspectors of elections, the officers who held the election, testify to what they knew about the marks upon these ballots? It is said in answer to this that the case was closed and that the contestee would not have an opportunity to rebut whatever might be testified on that subject.

Now, as I said, with all respect yesterday to the gentleman from Alabama, that is "too thin" an excuse for suppressing the facts that might shed such a world of light as to the character of the marks upon these tickets.

It is said that the committee never passed upon this branch of the case, and that it is hanging in the air yet. Why, Mr. Speaker, that committee is nothing but an instrument in the hands of the House. This House is the court to determine this question. The committee could not bar it. No law can bar us from investigating this question as to any fraud that may be claimed to surround it. And if it came to that I would insist before this august tribunal that if these Democratic judges and canvassers of election or anybody else for that matter could explain this transaction, we ought not to let it go to the country that we had permitted their testimony to be suppressed by the objections and protests of the contestee.

You do not need the vote or presence of Mr. Rockwell in this House so seriously in a political sense that any point of overpowering necessity arises, if it is fair to suspect that such an improper influence could affect the vote of a Representative. There is more than one majority here. Legislation can not be affected. Do not let it go to the country that you have refused to hear the testimony of the Democratic judges who held the election when there is a charge of fraud committed in the interest of the sitting member. If that point stood in the way of arriving at a true result I would unhesitatingly say let the whole matter be recommitting for a further investigation that shall not be hampered by technicalities. I know there are many members whose votes would not be given in favor of excluding one set of these ballots without the other in any event, unless you go to the bottom of the matter, and there is no reason why they should.

However, there is no necessity for recommitting this contest, because the contestee has not votes enough, if you count the Doyle ballots, which ought clearly to be counted, to seat him, even with the 28 marked ballots counted in his favor.

With one other observation I shall conclude, for I have already trespassed longer on the patience of the House than I anticipated in commencing these remarks. I want to call attention to the condition under which these Doyle ballots reach us. The law requires that the vote be canvassed and returned, not only on the face but on the back of the returns. As I have already said (and every lawyer will agree with me), when the officers had canvassed the votes and made their returns and adjourned, they had completed their duty and power under the law, except that under certain conditions they might be called upon to correct a clerical error.

Now, I want to read from the evidence to show how these Doyle ballots came before us. I do not know whether it has been read or not; but it seems to me interesting and pertinent in this connection. I know nothing about the machinery by which those Doyle ballots were produced in this House yesterday by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. COBB], but how did they get into the record? There is no evidence about the voting of these Doyle ballots, but we have them here to speak for themselves. They were produced by one of the Democratic canvassers the day after the election at the clerk's office. The return at the poll where these ballots were cast was made out properly on their face and that return was put into the hands of a supervisor without the sample ballots as required by law being put upon the back as they should have been.

The result was stated upon the face of the return; and this was signed by all the judges of the election. At this point they adjourned. It was some time during the next day that one of these gentlemen, whose powers as an officer were functus officio, of course, so far as any act of his might be concerned, repaired to the clerk's office, and taking these Doyle ballots from his pocket, directed that they should be placed upon the back of the return in order to give validity or effect, as he supposed, to the returns, and to cure some supposed defect that there may have been in making them out.

I do not put much stress upon that fact except to show that some interested person might have had access to and discovered these Doyle ballots for the first time after this board adjourned.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. The gentleman does not seem to be familiar with the evidence, which is clear to the point that these Doyle ballots were counted and noted on the night of the first count. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. WIKE. Of course they were counted; I understand that. I said they were. I said the result was made out and put on the face of the returns. But the ballots were not destroyed. Here is the point I want to make: This, the case of the contestee, is surrounded by suspicious circumstances which can not be explained on any ground that will free it from the taint of fraud and corruption; not necessarily, however, on his part. I only put this case as the record puts it. Why were not these ballots destroyed, as they should have been, on the night of the election? These Doyle ballots ought not to have been destroyed, because they ought to have been returned the night of the election on the back of the returns as sample ballots, but why were not the remainder destroyed? At the very poll where these Doyle ballots appeared the ballots were kept over—what for? That is the serious question. If it did not take the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] so long to answer, I would like to ask him why the ballots were not destroyed?

Mr. COBB of Alabama arose.

Mr. WIKE. Well, I do not know but that the one gentleman from Alabama is about as bad as the other. [Laughter.] However, I will hear him.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. The reason is given in the evidence; it is put down in the record. It was a matter of uncertainty with these inspectors, they never having performed duty before under this Australian system, whether the ballots should be destroyed or preserved.

Mr. WIKE. Why did they destroy half of them and preserve the other half?

Mr. COBB of Alabama. They did not destroy a single ballot, because on the recount the same number appeared as on the first count.

Mr. WIKE. I will leave the gentleman to settle that question with the witness whom I shall put upon the stand. I ask the Clerk to read from the record in this case the testimony of Daniel H. Berry. It is short, and it answers the question whether the ballots were destroyed or not destroyed, and how the Doyle ballots finally got onto the back of the returns.

This testimony will be found on pages 84 and 85 of the printed record.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. There were certain ballots destroyed, but—

Mr. WIKE. Well, listen to the testimony, which the Clerk will please read.

The Clerk read as follows:

[SEAL.]

GEO. H. HULBERT,
Notary Public in and for Seneca County, N. Y.

Mr. WIKE. Now, I hope the gentleman from Alabama is sufficiently answered.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Will you just allow me one moment?

Mr. WIKE. Well, I think the gentleman has had ample time in his three hours consumed yesterday to make his speech.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. As I explained on yesterday, the law requires—

Mr. WIKE. Oh, we know what the law requires. Let us not go over that again.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. I was going to explain, as to this testimony, that other witnesses testified—

Mr. WIKE. Well, I would greatly prefer that the gentleman should speak in his own time, as mine has about expired.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Very well; I will not interrupt the gentleman further.

Mr. WIKE. So, Mr. Speaker, I was correct in my statement that a portion of these ballots were not destroyed; and I repeat this question once more, why were they not destroyed? If any of them were destroyed, why not all of them as the law required? The law requiring their destruction does not apply, of course, to the sample ballots that should have been attached to the returns, but to all the other ballots cast at the election. If these men destroyed a portion of the ballots they must have known that the law required their destruction; and hence they must have had a purpose in reserving a portion from destruction. How many did they destroy? Probably none. At any rate they reserved enough for a nest egg; enough for seed; a margin, to graft upon in case of an emergency.

It was understood perfectly well that there was a close election and there must have been some reason for refusing to destroy those ballots as the law required, and the fact that some were kept over to the next day affords abundance of suspicion that they were kept for some fraudulent and improper purpose. There were six districts in which the ballots were not destroyed, and the conclusion is irresistible that they were held over for the purpose of a recount in the event it became necessary to overcome any small majority that might appear the next day or the day after in favor of Mr. Noyes. The necessity arose. The golden opportunity anticipated presented itself. A majority of a few votes in the contestant's favor had to be overcome, and the recount was accordingly made that overcame it. It was for this villainous purpose, politically speaking, in all human probability, that the ballots were not destroyed, as the law required they should be, on the night of the election. Nothing approaching this outrageous proceeding having the appearance of fraud and corruption occurs in the case of the contestant anywhere along the line from beginning to end.

[Mr. ALLEN withholds his remarks for revision. See Appendix.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has twenty minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. O'FERRALL. Mr. Speaker, there was an understanding that the time for debate this afternoon was to be divided equally between the two sides, and I think now that the time has been occupied in opposition to the report of the committee, and that it is only right that somebody present representing the majority of the committee should be heard.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi is entitled to one hour. Every gentleman has been allowed to address the House for an hour who had the floor in his own right.

Mr. ALLEN of Mississippi. Then I yield the floor to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND], as I understand my friend from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] will not address the House to-day.

Mr. O'FERRALL. There was certainly a distinct understanding that the time this afternoon was to be divided equally between the two sides. This puts that side in the lead, and we have the right to introduce somebody if anyone desires to speak in behalf of the majority. I will appeal to my friend from Alabama [Mr. COBB] if that was not the understanding?

Mr. COBB of Alabama. I will inquire of the Chair how the time stands?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. After the expiration of this hour fifty minutes will have been used by those in favor of retaining the contestee in his seat in excess of the time consumed on the other side. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. ALLEN] occupied forty minutes.

Mr. BLAND. That would give the other side the next hour, which would equalize the time.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. I will state what I agreed to. We did come to this agreement, and upon that agreement the chairman of the committee made the announcement. We agreed together that this afternoon should be devoted to the debate on this question, with the further understanding that two speeches were to be made to-morrow morning, one on either side, and that the recognition should be, so far as we could control it, to equal up the time between the two sides this afternoon.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the House gave no consent to such an agreement.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. I understand that.

Mr. BLAND. But the next hour can be given to gentlemen on the other side.

Mr. O'FERRALL. I had no idea on earth when I gave notice this morning that this agreement would be objected to. It was clearly understood that that arrangement would be carried out, and that the gentleman from New York [Mr. FELLOWS] and myself should close the debate to-morrow.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Let us understand this thing, for I want the House to carry out the agreement, if it will, in good faith. It is right that it should be done, and so far as I can have any influence I will insist upon it. Just as it stands at present how is the time between the two sides? The Chair stated that after the expiration of this hour—

Mr. O'FERRALL. There are twenty minutes remaining to the gentleman from Mississippi, I understand. Let him yield it.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Are you content to permit that?

Mr. O'FERRALL. I am; and I suppose that I will have time afterwards to equalize it.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, there is but a single phase of this case upon which I wish to present my views. I assume that we desire to dispose of the contest upon its merits. I certainly wish to consider it in that light. The portion of the case to which I wish to refer is that with relation to the Doyle ballots.

When the officers of election, in counting the ballots, came to the first one of this series, say the "A. Doyle" ballot, perhaps it did not arrest their attention. A little further along another, we will say the "B. Doyle" ballot, is found.

Perhaps the coincidence is noted, there being no such man as "A. Doyle" and no such man as "B. Doyle." A little further along another ballot is found marked "C. Doyle." The coincidence is still more marked. And so they count on, and in a little while there is found a "D. Doyle" ballot and an "E. Doyle" ballot, and a ballot with "F. Doyle" upon it and another with "G. Doyle," and so on to "T. Doyle." How far now would any reasonable man, any election officer, have to go in the handling of these ballots before a question would arise, Why this peculiar marking? Why is one man here voting for A. Doyle, another man for B. Doyle, another man for C. Doyle, and so down through the alphabetical line, until 16 of these peculiarly marked tickets are in the box?

Are there other peculiarities about them? Except that the name of Earl is stricken out of the printed ballots and the name "Doyle," with the varying initials, substituted, the tickets are the same. Now, suppose that an inquiry has arisen—and I say it would arise in the mind of any man—why this peculiar marking? How would you seek to solve that problem? When you look at the "A. Doyle" ballot alone—I say very frankly, on looking at that alone—no fair man ought to be willing to throw it out.

A. Doyle may be the voter's choice, or the fiction "A. Doyle" may be a mere whim of the voter. The man has a right to strike out the name of any candidate and insert the name of any other candidate, or any other person, or a name of his own creation. When you look at the "B. Doyle" ballot alone there would be no reason for throwing it out; but here are a series. You would look at the lot, would examine and compare the handwriting. You would find a striking similarity in this handwriting. "A. Doyle," "B. Doyle," "C. Doyle," and so on down the list—the names are all apparently in the same handwriting. And all the DoYLES are mythical creations.

Let us call some person acquainted with the handwriting, if such person can be found; see whether anybody knows whose writing it is. Yes, here is a witness; and here is another witness who knows the handwriting. The sworn testimony is before us. It is established beyond dispute or controversy that some particular man wrote all these Doyle names upon these ballots. Who is this man? He is named. He is identified. He is Duncan McArthur. What connection and relation had he to these ballots? Where does he live? Where is he to be found? In what business is he engaged?

Well, you find that this man was an active worker for one of the tickets; that there was no contest whatever with respect to the office for which Earl was a candidate, his name being printed on all the Republican and Democratic tickets and posters, but that the contest was between the other persons named on the respective tickets for other offices. What ticket was this man in favor of? In favor of the ticket which you find here marked with these names, A. Doyle, B. Doyle, C. Doyle, etc. How did this man manifest his interest in the result of the election? The evidence discloses that. He was one of a party handling "a fund."

The evidence further discloses that the man who did the writing on the Doyle ballots, Duncan McArthur, was engaged in the shameless business of corrupting voters, of buying persons to vote this party ticket. Now, having progressed thus far, I submit the question to any fair-minded man, sitting as a juror, without asking or saying whether the marked tickets were Republican or Democratic, without asking or saying anything about who would gain or who lose by counting or throwing out these Doyle ballots, what is your conclusion in regard to this series of ballots? Are they honest ballots?

Some man, actuated by a whim, some passing fancy, might put "A. Doyle" on his ticket; another happen, maybe, to put "B. Doyle" on his ballot. But these 16 ballots are not such freaks, for the same man did all the marking upon all of them. That same man was engaged in the business of procuring as many votes as he could for that particular ticket, and engaged, as the evidence shows, in procuring them by bribery. He did procure some votes for that ticket in that way. Now, up to this point there is absolutely no possibility, on this evidence, of doubt or error. The tickets were marked and voted. They were undoubtedly marked by McArthur. He is identified by name, by residence. He is right there in the very town where these votes were cast and where, later on, this testimony was taken. That man was a worker for one of the parties, for one of the tickets. He caused himself to be greatly interested in the result, resorted to the law-defying and law-breaking business of buying votes.

Now, who would gain and who would lose if these votes are counted? That question answers itself. If further facts are to be brought out, who shall bring them out? Should the man who challenges these ballots, Rockwell, be required to prove by this corruptor, this discredited man, McArthur, further facts to make good his challenge? That is precisely where this case hinges, so far as these ballots are concerned. If it is necessary for the man who asks for their rejection to make that proof from out of the mouth of the man who bought the votes against him and who, no doubt, paid for them, then these 16 votes ought to be counted, for Rockwell did not call McArthur. But I submit to every man of common experience, whether you or I, or any other man having gone that far, having brought this evidence absolutely home to this man, having proven on him this corruption, should be required to produce his testimony in corroboration? When you produce a witness you say, in effect, to those who are asked to pass upon the case, "Here I bring before you a man who knows something—a man who will swear to something, on which you may rely and form your conclusions; I bring to you a man who knows the truth and will speak the truth."

As a matter of human experience, as a matter of law, as a matter of practice in the courts, as a matter of common sense, would any man pursue that course? Would any man who has been the sufferer by bribery, who has been the victim of this vile abuse, be required to call this man who has degraded the ballot had disgraced himself, and say of him "here is a credible witness, and from the lips of this man, from these polluted, blackened, stained lips you will get the truth; upon this man my hopes shall rest."

Now, gentlemen, let us turn the matter around. Here is the other man, the man who is to get the full benefit of those ballots, the contestant. He learns from the testimony that McArthur has been buying votes. He knows that McArthur has been working for him, and to him McArthur would be absolutely fair and candid, no doubt. He hears witnesses swear that McArthur has been engaged in this bribery, and he knows that he will get the benefit of those votes if they are counted. Now, naturally the man who was to get the benefit of those disputed ballots would be interested in the determination of this matter.

What would he do? Would there be any hesitancy on his part in going to McArthur and saying to him, "You see what this testimony is; you were right here while they were taking it. Here is this testimony which is liable to be damaging to both of us. It is liable to convey impressions that will be very injurious to me and to you. How is it? What do you know about these Doyle ballots? What explanation have you to make? What do you say to this charge of bribery?" It is past human comprehension, absolutely past human comprehension, why such questions were not asked in behalf of Noyes, or if asked, why we have not the answers, if they could help Noyes's case.

Now, this man is charged with having bribed voters, and Noyes is going to get the benefit of those votes if they are counted, but will be defeated if they are not counted. What would Noyes or his attorneys naturally do under such circumstances? Would it not be a duty to go to the man who could explain, and ask him for an explanation? Is there any other common sense basis of conduct? Is there not a connection between the parties, though total strangers? They may have never met in the world. Is there not a necessary connection which warrants one in going to the other and saying: "This thing looks a little ugly; it is capable of a bad construction, and I want you to give me an explanation of it."

I say it is past human comprehension that a man would not do that much for himself. Mr. Speaker, asserting it as a conclusion and not as a fact in testimony, I feel warranted in saying that it was done, and that the explanation could not be made.

Now, take it from another view. Here is a man living in the town where this damaging testimony is taken, an active partisan, as any man has a right to be while he is a decent man at the same time: here is a man living in this town, an active worker for his ticket. That brings no reproach upon him; none at all. But it is said in testimony that he has done a great wrong. Men swear that he has committed bribery; has corrupted voters; has committed an offense, which if proved beyond a reasonable doubt would put him behind the bars, and which, even as a charge, though not proved beyond doubt, leaves him a marked, disgraced man in the community.

Now, is that man going to remain dumb if he can explain the transaction? I say, Mr. Speaker, in view of all that has been shown about these ballots, any implicated man of prudence, any man of fairness, any man of reason, would try to explain them if it could be done. But there is not a solitary thing shown in explanation, although there was abundant opportunity. In such a case the conclusion is to my mind absolutely irresistible that those ballots were procured by bribery; that those ballots are such ballots as under the laws—not only the statutes of the State of New York, but all laws known to decent people everywhere—are to be excluded from the count.

Yet, I know that honest men disagree about this question as about other questions. I know that matters present themselves to different minds in different shapes, and I am merely trying to convey to the House in brief form the view of this case which to me seems correct. I take it for granted that it is the intention, as it is the duty, of every gentleman here to vote his own honest judgment upon this question. With these ballots marked, as has been said, as a man would mark them if he wanted to be able to determine the particular voter who voted each particular ballot, with the question of who did mark them uncontroverted, and that person proven a briber for that ticket, with every opportunity for explanation presented in the very town where this transaction took place, right under the shadow of the residence of the man charged with the bribery, I believe it is certain that the explanation would have come if there was any decent explanation to be made.

It is said that these ballots might have been marked innocently. It is said that the men who voted them might have voted them innocently. Well, who could have pointed out the men who voted them? Obviously the man who handled them and wrote "Doyle" upon them, if anybody. It could have been ascertained in two ways. Any man who voted one of those ballots could have come forward and told of it; and McArthur might have given the names. But who on Rockwell's side could have gone through the streets of that town of Waterloo and summoned those men, and by any sort of magic looked into their consciences and hearts and determined who voted the Doyle ballots?

If this had been a casual marking, if it had not been an intentional marking for a corrupt purpose, what was to prevent any man who had voted one of those ballots from coming forward and saying: "Here, you challenge," say, "this 'B. Doyle' ballot; you say it ought to be thrown out. I voted that 'B. Doyle' ballot; do not throw it out. That is an honest, clean ballot." The men who voted those 16 ballots could have come forward and offered some explanation; and McArthur could have told who voted them.

Rockwell, the contestee in this case, could not possibly have hunted up those 16 men; the contestant might possibly have done it with the aid of the man who marked the ballots and who probably—I think certainly—knew the men to whom he gave them.

What better method than this of determining after election whether certain given ballots had been voted as agreed could have been devised by any bribe-giver? None under the sun. Mr. Speaker, if we determine this contest as a matter of right, as a matter of justice, we shall, I believe, throw out the Doyle ballots. The testimony before us tends very strongly to prove that they are the ballots of corrupted voters, ingeniously marked to be identified. The failure of Noyes to call McArthur has all the force of an admission that all that is testified to concerning McArthur and all that may be fairly inferred from it is true. The failure of McArthur to offer to testify, to insist on testifying, is full confession of all the guilt imputed to him. By the sternest of facts and of logic the Doyle ballots are condemned, and since the contestant's case is hopeless without them, the contestee is entitled, in my judgment, to retain his seat.

Mr. CHIPMAN. Mr. Speaker, I am well aware of the gravity of this occasion. We are not here to ask the question in the immortal language of a late statesman, "Which is our damned rascal?" We are here to perform a sacred duty. There is involved in this case, not simply the right of the individual to the seat, not only his own integrity, but there is involved the dignity and purity of this House, and above all the rights of the people of the district whose election is in controversy. And in considering such a question it is our duty to approach it dispassionately. Any man who feels aught of resentment at the course pursued in this House during the last Congress—any man who is conscious of aught of heat or of prejudice, should pause and reconsider his position, because he is in a condition which renders him an unsafe person to act in a matter of this importance.

I can not consent, and I never will consent, to following any example set here in the past or bowing to any exigency of my party, to consider a question of this kind as a partisan question. Farewell to American liberty, farewell to the rights of constituencies when that rule prevails in this body. That we should be judicial, that we should be intelligent, that we should be fair—not that we should be partisans—is the exact duty which is demanded of us now.

There has been a great deal of discussion, which, with all respect to the gentlemen around me, I consider profitless. A great deal of law has been cited—good enough in its place, but whose place is not in this case. For instance, one gentleman cited from a work upon statutes by a leading author the general proposition that an act prohibited is an illegal act.

Unquestionably that is so; but if the gentleman had taken pains to notice the collocation of the clause in the authority, he would have found that it was confined entirely to the enforcement of contracts—not to the exercise of a political right or function by a citizen. On the contrary, in reference to an act of this kind—the act of voting—when without corrupt motives the voter's ticket may be marked so that another may know whose ticket it is—while if he consents to this, he may be subject to the penalty prescribed by the statute, yet that statute does not pretend, nor can it be made by any construction to mean, to take away from him his franchise as a voter. You can not extend the penalty. That is a familiar principle in all law.

Need I argue it to lawyers; need I argue it to American citizens jealously conscious of what liberty is? You can not add a punishment to the punishment fixed by a statute. You can not say that the man shall be punished by fine and imprisonment, because the statute says so, and in addition to that, shall be punished by losing his vote—unless he has been guilty of corrupt conduct in connection with it. Fraud retains its old place and its old consequences in the election laws. A man may violate the statute as to marked ballots and yet be guilty of no corruption, which, under the old rule, would discredit his vote.

There are two aspects of this New York law: First, is the old policy of an honest ballot, the policy which we have been struggling to attain for years and years in this country, and which we hope now we are on the point of perfecting. But added to that is the policy that the voter shall keep his vote absolutely secret. Heretofore it has been his privilege to tell how he voted; or he might refuse even in a court of justice to tell. He might do just as he pleased. But now the law comes in and says: "This is not your privilege; it is not your personal right simply; but it is the privilege, the right, the protection, the grand need of society; and we have framed this provision in order to insure freedom from dictation and to render corruption hopeless of success. So that when the law says this it says it in a reasonable sense."

The object is to prevent corruption and dictation; and if the voter marks his ballot so that others may know it as his, the law says: "While you may not be corrupt, still you shall be punished for doing this because it is against public policy." And on the other hand the law says: "If in addition you have been guilty of corruption, whatever punishment is affixed to corruption shall be meted out to you, for you are guilty of two offenses—first, of marking your ballot contrary to the statute, and secondly, of committing fraud, both of which the statutes punish."

Now, upon both the reports here there can be no doubt that Mr. Noyes was entitled to the certificate of election. The decision of the highest court in the State of New York is decisive upon that point. Not the ballots pasted on the back of the statements—or what we generally call the returns of the vote made by the canvassers—but the statements themselves, the court of appeals say, in their decision, are "fundamental, jurisdictional, and conclusive." Can language be stronger than that? Do gentlemen know what that language means, coming from a court of last resort? "Fundamental, jurisdictional, conclusive!" That is, the statement was all that the county canvassers could act upon, all that the board of State canvassers could act upon.

It is final so far as they are concerned. Their duties are purely ministerial; they have no judicial power to sit and try the question whether the ballot is marked so that the man who voted it might be ascertained by that mark. They can not hold a court upon every occasion when they are counting ballots and trying to ascertain the result of elections. It would be monstrous if at the whim or caprice of any election officer the ballot of a citizen might be cast out without a full, judicial hearing. A pretty portal that would be to the sanctity of election—a most singular reform of the elective franchise, which would allow canvassers in the heat and zeal and hurry of an election, without hearing testimony, without the responsibility of an oath being put upon anybody, to disfranchise a citizen and cast out his ballot upon a determination that it was marked so that others might know who voted it. To ascertain that certainly requires a judicial procedure.

So that it will be seen we start from this position—that Mr. Noyes was entitled to the certificate. Whether the 16 Doyle ballots were legal or not, whether the 28 Rockwell ballots were legal or not, Mr. Noyes starts from that position; and if the returning board of the State of New York had respected the decision of that high tribunal, the court of appeals, the only body to whom is confided by the institutions of that State the duty of determining what the law is, they would have given Mr. Noyes the certificate.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman allow an interruption? The court of appeals did not pronounce on the case when the returns were before the authorities in New York.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I may be in error about that. But still the essential fact remains—and that is the fact which is important in this connection—that Mr. Noyes, under the decision of the supreme court of the State, was entitled to the certificate.

Mr. O'FERRALL. The certificate was issued, if the gentleman will permit me to interrupt him, after the decision of the supreme court in special session.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I do not know what process there was; I do not know by what means the decision was circumvented; I do not know why this spectacle is presented of the court of appeals of this great State, which alone has the power to construe the law, deciding one way, and a body not at all clothed with that power, but having a ministerial capacity only, deciding in another way. I care not. The grand fact, the root, the foundation fact, the one from which we start in our entire investigation of this case, remains that either the supreme court of New York was wrong or Mr. Noyes was entitled to the certificate. Now, gentlemen, if we do not desire to evade what is exactly spread before our eyes, if we do not wish to cheat our own senses, if we are not overcome by prejudice, if it is not our will that our prejudices should overwhelm us, or that partisan zeal shall outrun our discretion, that fact must of necessity have great weight in the discussion of this matter and in the determination of the result.

We start there. I do not care about the other votes, the scattering votes, discussed by gentlemen—some of whom succeeded in bringing the majority down to 6, and in some instances to 2 or 3.

I care nothing about these. The question is raised over the Doyle ballots principally; but I submit, and hope I can maintain, to this House that there is a greater question still than the Doyle ballots, and that is in reference to the 28 marked ballots which it is contended are not in testimony. So far as the Doyle ballots are concerned, they may or may not have been put into the box corruptly. It is barely possible that they may not have been.

My judgment is that there was probably corruption in connection with these ballots. Whether there was or not the testimony is before you, and it is for you to determine one way or the other. But testimony was offered in regard to the 28 ballots which were marked in a peculiar manner. It is said that they came in after rebuttal; came in too late under the statute. I grant that. I have no quarrel with that position; but is a gentleman willing to occupy his seat in this House, is he willing to embark his honor upon a mere technicality? That is the question.

But, sir, there is a higher question still remaining. Are we, with a fact of this nature staring us in the face, to ignore it entirely, and say the technical rules of law deprive this great body of acting in a way which is compatible with its dignity and its power? Sir, you have a law of contests; but a contest is not necessary to a decision of the right to a seat here. You can not by any statute deprive the House of the full and affluent power to determine the right of a man to a seat. You can not bind yourselves to the technicalities of a statutory proceeding. You have no constitutional capacity to do that. Ordinarily you ought to be so bound; ordinarily whatever is required by statute to be done in these cases should be done.

But here a wonderful thing happens. Here, in the beginning of the reform so eulogized by my friend from Mississippi [Mr. ALLEN], are two facts thrust upon us from the same district in the great State of New York, one the Doyle ballots and the other the 28 marked ballots with the 5 and the 8 and the check marks thereon. Can we shut our eyes to their existence? Suppose a man comes on this floor and subsequently admits that he is an alien, that he never was naturalized. Will you wait until somebody contests his seat? Will you let him stay here in violation of the Constitution and of your rights, day in and day out, until a technical contest is presented before you unseat him? By no means. You would simply say, "Depart; you have no right here."

Now, in regard to these 28 votes. I appeal to gentlemen to know what were they marked for? Who knows, uninvestigated as it is, but that it was a piece of subtler villainy than even the Doyle transaction? Was it done from a spirit of idle sport? Was it, like the Doyle ballots, a mere retail corruption, or a corruption by job lots en masse? Then who was the villain; who committed the wrong; and why were these marks put on the ballots? If the position just taken by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. ALLEN] is correct, that any mark on the ballot which would designate it is prima facie evidence of fraud, why does not the gentleman who is holding this seat arise and say to the House: "You have the power; let me go on; this man took me unawares—this contestant; he came upon me unprepared; I had not the time; but you can give me the time, give me all the days of this Congress, to vindicate my honor and to vindicate my right to a seat here." You could do it; he could do it.

There is nothing in the Constitution to prohibit it, but everything to invite it, and no statute can curtail the power to do it. There is everything to commend such a course, and for that reason I have no doubt that this case should be recommitted to the committee to give the gentleman an opportunity to dispel the doubt which exists in the minds of many to-day. Sir, if the presumption is conclusive that the alphabetical Doyle marks on the Noyes ballots are evidence of fraud, it is equally conclusive that the numeral marks and checks on the Rockwell ballots are evidence. It is only on such a presumption that each and every of the Doyle ballots can be invalidated.

Sir, it is of more importance that every seat here shall be a clean seat than that any particular man shall sit in it.

Mr. HAUGEN. Will the gentleman permit an interruption? Mr. CHIPMAN. Certainly.

Mr. HAUGEN. In regard to these 28 ballots, the gentleman is aware that the counsel for contestee objected and instructed the witness not to answer the questions put.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I heard that. I do not wish to say anything acrimonious.

Mr. HAUGEN. It appears in the record.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I repeat, I do not wish to say anything acrimonious. There might be a view of this subject which would call for an outburst which I do not regard proper on this occasion. It might be that some of you gentlemen would have stood up manfully and said, "I will waive everything. This smirches me." To use a favorite expression of my friend from Mississippi [Mr. ALLEN], some of you would have said, "This fly-blows me. I will not submit to it. I will not rest under the imputation, and if the law does not give me the time, the House will give it to me, and I will assert my own dignity and my own honor."

But, Mr. Speaker, I repeat it is of more importance that there shall be clean seats here than that you or I or any particular man shall be here. The liberties of the people are involved in just such issues as this. If we treat lightly a contest for a place here, if we juggle and gamble with the ballot box upon this floor, what becomes of your ballot reform? What becomes of the dignity of your institutions? Of what honor is a place in this House? If you are here, the poor creature the product of fraud, of twilight methods, of doubtful means, what honor to put "M. C." at the end of your name? What glory to go forth and be ranked with the wretches who do mean and doubtful deeds?

Mr. O'FERRALL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

APPEALS IN CAPITAL CASES.

Mr. HOAR. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2171) to amend section 766 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, to report it favorably, with an amendment. I call the attention of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] to the report.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I ask the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary if he will object to my requesting the unanimous consent of the Senate for the immediate consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOAR and Mr. HARRIS. Let the bill be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 766 of the Revised Statutes be amended by adding thereto, at the end of said section, the following words: "Provided, That said appeal shall not stay execution in capital cases unless accompanied by an order from the judge from whose decision such appeal is taken, restraining the sheriff or other officer from executing the sentence of the trial court."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. DOLPH. I should like to know what the section is that is proposed to be amended and what the bill is before I consent to its being considered at present.

Mr. HOAR. I will make an explanation, if it please the Senate. Let the amendment be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the committee will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. Add to the bill:

Or unless such order be obtained from some justice of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. HOAR. The section of the Revised Statutes of the United States referred to authorizes an appeal to the circuit court of the United States, among other things, where any person convicted in a State court claims to have acted under the authority of any statute of the United States, or under any authority derived from the law of the United States, or that he is restrained of his liberty in violation of the Constitution or any law or treaty of the United States, or where he justifies his act by setting up an authority from any foreign power, the latter being intended to cover the old McLeod case, which my friend from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] knows as thoroughly as anybody, who was formerly a citizen of the State of New York, where it arose.

The provision of the Revised Statutes further is that where an application is made to a circuit court of the United States for a habeas corpus, and an appeal is taken, no action of the State authority shall be of any validity thereafter until the appeal is decided. That provision was originally applied only to a case where the prisoner set up the action of a foreign government in justification, but by a subsequent statute that provision is extended to all cases, the result of which is that a person sentenced capitally in a State court may apply to a circuit court of the United States and set up that he was acting under some authority of the United States in the matter for which he is convicted, or that he is restrained of his liberty in violation of the Constitution or any law or treaty of the United States, and if the habeas corpus be denied by the circuit court he can appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, and in such cases all proceedings in the State must be suspended. When the case reaches the Supreme Court of the United States, and is just ready for decision he can withdraw his appeal, or his claim can be overruled by the Supreme Court of the United States, he takes another application to a circuit court and another appeal, and so on forever.

Judge Sawyer, a very eminent and learned judge, lately deceased, held—and the circuit court in New Jersey deems itself bound by the precedent established by Judge Sawyer—that the overruling of one appeal or the withdrawal of one does not prevent a new application and a new appeal founded on precisely the same cause. Although Judge Green, of the New Jersey circuit, does not think that is a sound view, he feels constrained to follow it. So no person can be executed capitally in this country. There is a man in New Jersey who has been sentenced by the court of that State to be executed for an atrocious murder of his own wife. He pleaded guilty, and the court under the law of New Jersey declared the murder to be murder in the first degree, and he was sentenced to be executed. He comes into the circuit court and claims that that is in violation of the Constitution of the United States, which provides a jury trial in all capital cases, although it has been again and again declared by the Supreme Court of the United States that that provision of the Constitution does not apply to State courts, but only to courts of the United States, which is as well settled a doctrine of law as any in the reports. Still Judge Green, denying his application for a habeas corpus, feels constrained to grant his appeal, and, one having been granted and withdrawn by the petitioner, he comes and asks anew and gets another one, so that the State authority is absolutely defied.

The bill proposes to remedy that by providing that the proceedings in the State where an appeal is taken shall not be delayed unless one of two things happens: either the judge who denies the application for a habeas corpus and grants the appeal shall make an order directing the State authority to proceed no further, or, in order that that may not rest exclusively on the discretion of the judge whose judgment is appealed from, that such order shall be obtained from any justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. This appeal has existed only since 1885 in the suspension of this class of cases, and we think we have carefully guarded it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HALE. I shall not object if it takes no time.

Mr. HOAR. It is over now.

Mr. PALMER. I should like—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois rise to object to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. PALMER. I merely want to ask a question.

Mr. HALE. I object, if it gives rise to debate.

Mr. HOAR. I think all the time has been taken that will be required.

Mr. PALMER. I merely want to ask if the bill would still permit applications to be made to any justice of the Supreme Court.

Mr. HOAR. Certainly, the application may be made to any justice of the Supreme Court.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary to add to the bill:

Or unless such order be obtained from some justice of the Supreme Court of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. HOAR. There is a brief letter from the attorney-general of New Jersey to the Senator from New Jersey, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD as part of my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered, if there be no objection.

The letter is as follows:

STATE OF NEW JERSEY, OFFICE OF ATTORNEY-GENERAL,
Trenton, February 10, 1892.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I desire through you to call the attention of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate to the importance of an immediate amendment of Revised Statutes 764, as amended by the act of March 3, 1885.

Judge Sawyer, in re Sun Hung and another, 24 Federal Reporter, page

723, thus speaks of the section as it stands: "Upon examination I have come to the conclusion that I have no discretion in the matter, and that the right of appeal is absolute. I think the act must have passed without due consideration, without appreciating the effect or the consequences of an unlimited right of appeal." Other circuit courts have taken the same view of the act, and the courts of the United States are being used in cases where they have no jurisdiction to stay the execution of the criminal laws by the State courts. There have been several cases, but perhaps the most striking is the case of Hallinger, which was before Judge Green, judge of the district court of New Jersey. The case was this: About a year ago Hallinger pleaded guilty in the court of oyer and terminer of the county of Hudson to an indictment setting forth the facts constituting atrocious murder of his own wife.

Under the New Jersey statute and in accordance with the settled practice of the State the judge fixed the degree of murder which the law applied to the facts as murder in the first degree. He was accordingly sentenced to be hung. A few days before the time of execution application was made to Judge Green for a writ of habeas corpus under the act of 1867, extending the power of the United States judiciary "to all cases where any person may be restrained of liberty in violation of the Constitution or any treaty or law of the United States" (see section 754, chapter 30, title habeas corpus, Revised Statutes 1878). The petition alleged that Hallinger was deprived of his liberty contrary to the Constitution of the United States and the constitution of the State of New Jersey, because he had not had a trial by jury. Judge Green refused to grant the writ, and petitioner took an appeal; the judge allowed the appeal under the statute. The petitioner did not prosecute the appeal, but suffered it to be dismissed by the Supreme Court of the United States. In accordance with the practice in New Jersey another day was fixed by the judge for the execution, which was the 10th of February. On the 6th an application was made to Judge Green again for another writ of habeas corpus; the petition containing the full record of the court and alleging, as before, that the detention was in violation of the constitution of the State and of the United States because the culprit had not had a trial by jury. The attorney-general of the State was notified after the judge had refused the writ, but before the appeal papers had been indorsed. He objected to the appeal being granted on the ground that the judge himself had decided that he had no jurisdiction in the matter, and therefore no appeal would lie; that in Jugro's case (140 U. S., page 291) the court held that the statute made the appeal a stay from all proceedings in the State court "until final judgment;" that the former appeal should be considered as an estoppel from a new application for release from the same imprisonment.

Judge Green agreed entirely with the attorney-general, but felt himself bound by the decision of Judge Sawyer and the words of the act to grant the appeal, although on the face of the petition itself it appeared that it simply was an effort to examine into error from a writ of habeas corpus directly from a court of oyer and terminer of the State to the Supreme Court of the United States. This construction of the statute is contrary to the ruling of the Supreme Court of the United States in re Lange and Ex parte Parks, where it is held that if a court has jurisdiction and a writ of error lies under a writ of habeas corpus, it will be also observed that it is settled law that the fifth amendment to the Constitution of the United States does not guarantee the right of trial by jury in the State courts, and the allegation is therefore simply that the State law is not in accordance with the State constitution, and this is the only question presented to the United States judge, and for which reason he of course promptly refused the writ.

My own judgment is that Hallinger could have been hung to-day without any risk whatever. Judge Green refused to make any declaration on the subject, and directed the sheriff to take the advice of the attorney-general. In view of the fact that Judge Green granted the appeal against his will, because he felt bound by the decision of Judge Sawyer, and that Judge Sawyer, in making the decision, had pointed out the evil which would flow from his construction, and the fact that Judge Harlan held in Jugro's case that the appeal was an absolute stay. I advised the sheriff to disobey the sentence of our own court.

Under these circumstances Judge Green has suggested that the power of appeal should be discretionary in the court or judge refusing the writ. As this is also the opinion of Judge Sawyer, it would seem to be proper that such an amendment should be immediately made to relieve the State authorities from the dilemma in which they are placed; or it is suggested that the same end would be reached by declaring that no appeal should be a stay, but giving discretion to a judge of the supreme court or the presiding judge of the circuit court of appeals to grant a stay in his discretion.

You will see the importance of immediate action in this matter, and I will thank you to present it to the proper committee, and if I can be of any service in further explanation I will be glad to attend on being notified.

I am, very truly, yours,

JOHN P. STOCKTON.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

The bill was passed.

LANDS AT DETROIT.

Mr. WILSON. By direction of the Committee on the Judiciary I report back favorably without amendment the joint resolution (H. Res. 10) for the release of all claim of the United States to lot 18, section 2, governor and judges' plan, Detroit. Inasmuch as it is a matter of some importance in connection with quieting title, I ask that the joint resolution may be considered at the present time. It will give rise to no debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. HALE. If it gives rise to no debate I shall not object.

Mr. WILSON. I do not think it will incur any debate.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. WILSON. In explanation of the joint resolution, I will state that it was submitted to the Secretary of the Interior for any suggestions or information that he might desire to communicate to the committee, and he referred the matter to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, who has reported fully upon it, and from which report I will read two brief paragraphs. Referring to the report of the House Judiciary Committee, he says:

It appears from said House Judiciary report that the western part of the lot in question "passed by due conveyance into the possession of Gen. Lewis Cass," and further, that "a search through the Departments here fails to show a title in Gen. Cass to the eastern portion of the said lot." I am therefore of the opinion that the Government has never in any manner parted with title to the eastern portion of said lot 18, except as provided by the above-cited act of August 29, 1842, in accordance with which fee-simple title to all public land in the original site of Detroit passed to the mayor, recorder, and aldermen of said city.

Said last-named officials were required to make report of their proceedings to Congress on or before January 1, 1844. Presuming that they did so without having conveyed to anyone the portion of the lot in question, and in view of Mr. Glover's long and undisputed possession of the same, I respectfully recommend the removal of all cloud to his title thereto by the passage of the resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DISTRICT BUILDING PERMITS.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I am directed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 118) to suspend the issue of permits to erect dwelling houses in alleys in the District of Columbia, to report it favorably with amendments, and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration. The matter is one of great importance.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the object of the joint resolution?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Let the amendments be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments of the committee are now in order, and will be stated.

Mr. KENNA. Let the joint resolution be read as proposed to be amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 6, strike out the words "until further provided for by," and insert in lieu thereof "less than 40 feet in width, during the first session of the Fifty-second;" so as to read:

That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby instructed not to issue any more permits for buildings intended for human habitation in alleys in the District of Columbia less than 40 feet in width during the first session of the Fifty-second Congress.

Mr. WOLCOTT. There is another amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the first amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. KENNA. Let the joint resolution be read as it would stand if amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That may be done for the information of the Senate. The amendments, however, must be proceeded with in a parliamentary way.

Mr. KENNA. For that purpose I ask that it be done. It is very short.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read as it would read if amended.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution as proposed to be amended, as follows:

The Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby instructed not to issue any more permits for buildings intended for human habitation in alleys in the District of Columbia less than 40 feet in width during the first session of the Fifty-second Congress; and that all such permits heretofore granted on alleys less than the width aforesaid shall be revoked where construction shall not already have been actually begun.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the first amendment reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia which has been read.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The committee report to add to the joint resolution:

And that all such permits heretofore granted on alleys less than the width aforesaid shall be revoked where construction shall not already have been actually begun.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I move that the Senate request a conference with the House of Representatives on the joint resolution and amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. WOLCOTT, Mr. McMILLAN, and Mr. HARRIS were appointed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. DAVIS introduced a bill (S. 2979) for the relief of Edward Dorsey, late Company C, First United States Colored Troops; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FRYE introduced a bill (S. 2980) to correct the military record of Michael Collins; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BUTLER introduced a bill (S. 2981) for the relief of the Citadel Academy of Charleston, S. C.; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs; and I beg to call the attention of the committee to the affidavits of the superintendent of the Citadel Academy and two officers of that institution, and also a letter from the War Department in regard to the destruction by fire of its ordnance stores by the Government, the object being to relieve that institution of any money liability on that account.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill and accompanying papers will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PROCTOR introduced a bill (S. 2982) to restore to the pension roll the name of Mary F. Prindle; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DANIEL (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2983) to authorize the construction of a railway across the Government reservation at Willoughby Spit, Va.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. FRYE introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 75) authorizing the printing of 2,000 copies of the Twenty-third Annual List of Merchant Vessels of the United States, for the year ending June 30, 1891; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. FRYE. I ask that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Printing. I call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Printing to the fact that the edition of that book is very small. It is a list of names of vessels. I think the edition is only 2,000, and the vessel-owners of Maine, I am informed, want to take up nearly the whole of the edition themselves.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. WILSON introduced a bill (S. 2984) defining "lard" and imposing a tax on manufactures of compound lard; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. WALTHALL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CULLOM submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

NAVAL OBSERVATORY HEARING.

Mr. HALE submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the stenographer employed to report the hearings before the Committee on Naval Affairs on Senate bill No. 1703, to provide for a more perfect organization for the United States Naval Observatory, and for other purposes, be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

WILLIAM AND MARY COLLEGE, OF VIRGINIA.

Mr. HALE. I gave notice yesterday that I should call up the urgent deficiency appropriation bill on the close of the routine morning business this morning. I learn that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] is desirous of leaving the city within a short time, and that he has a bill which will involve no debate, and I will not at present interfere with him. If the bill takes up much time I must ask the Senate to go on with the appropriation bill; but I will not interfere now.

Mr. HOAR. I call up Senate bill 2566, according to the agreement yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By the unanimous consent of the Senate, given yesterday, the Chair lays before the Senate the bill (S. 2566) for the relief of William and Mary College of Virginia.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to pay to the College of William and Mary, in Virginia, $64,000 to reimburse that college for the destruction of its buildings and other property destroyed without authority by soldiers of the United States during the late war.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HOAR subsequently said: I ask that the report, which is brief, in regard to the bill (S. 2566) for the relief of William and Mary College of Virginia may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PLATT in the chair). The Senator from Massachusetts asks that the report of the Committee on Claims on the bill referred to by him, which was passed this morning, be printed in the RECORD in connection with the action of the Senate upon the bill. If there be no objection that order will be made. The Chair hears none.

The report, submitted by Mr. WHITE March 6, 1892, is as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred Senate bill 2566, submitted the following report:

A bill similar in its nature has been before Congress for many years, has often been reported favorably in the House and in the Senate, and has passed the House and Senate at various times, but never reached consideration in both Houses of any one Congress.

Your committee adopted now as their own the report made in the House of Representatives, first session, Forty-fourth Congress, on behalf of the Committee on Education and Labor, by the Hon. GEORGE F. HOAR. That report, as will be observed, apart from technical legal considerations, bases its conclusions upon broad and comprehensive lines of justice and public policy. These findings, being predicated on exceptional conditions, can give rise to no fear of engendering thereby a general rule to do harm if invoked in the future.

The report is as follows:

"On the 9th day of September, 1862, the principal building of the College of William and Mary was destroyed by fire. This college is in the town of Williamsburg, 35 miles from Fort Monroe, on territory which remained under the control of the United States during nearly the whole of the war. Williamsburg is situated on the narrowest part of the peninsula, partly in the county of York and partly in that of James City. York County was in the hands of the Union troops from May, 1862, to the close of the war. It was never during that time treated as rebel territory; was expressly excepted from President Lincoln's original proclamation of emancipation; it formed a part of the State of Virginia, which had for a time its seat of government at Alexandria under Governor Pierpont, was represented in Congress, and gave the necessary constitutional assent to the separation of West Virginia. The college is a little over the line in James City, but was in the town of Williamsburg, and was held by the Union forces, as was York County, and was practically Union territory as much as the rest of the town of which it formed a part.

"Before the fire the United States took possession of the college buildings for military uses. Its rooms contained hay and other stores and cavalry equipments. The day before the destruction of the building a court-martial was going on in it, which was not over at the time of the destruction. On the morning of May 9, after a conflict between the Union forces and a body of rebel cavalry, the latter got possession of the place for a few hours. After their withdrawal, some returning stragglers of the garrison, provoked by defeat and under the influence of drink, set fire to the building and prevented the residents of the neighborhood from extinguishing the flames till it was wholly consumed.

"The sum appropriated by the accompanying bill is somewhat less than the actual value of the building, which was erected in 1859, and is without the addition of interest.

"We are of the opinion that the United States should restore the building so destroyed, for several reasons which do not apply to any other claim which ever which can hereafter be made for the injury or destruction of property during the rebellion. The Government had taken possession of the property for its own purposes, excluding the owners and preventing them from taking any measures to secure its protection. This was on what was practically friendly and not hostile territory, and the case should be treated as if it had happened in Washington or Philadelphia.

"There are other considerations which appeal most powerfully alike to reason and patriotic feeling in demanding this relief.

"Every civilized nation has its hallowed spots, about which its patriotic memories cluster, and whose names arise before the imagination whenever these memories are stirred. Sometimes these spots are the scenes of famous battles, as Bunker Hill, or Saratoga, or Yorktown; sometimes the places where the foundations of great States have been laid, as at Jamestown or Plymouth; sometimes where great civic events occurred, as in Independence Hall or Faneuil Hall; sometimes the dwelling places or burial places of heroes or statesmen, as Mount Vernon or Westminster Abbey; sometimes the venerable institutions of learning which have educated and trained the great benefactors of the people, as Oxford and Cambridge, Harvard, Yale, Princeton, and William and Mary. Under our form of government these hallowed spots are in the custody of States. But they hold them as trustees for the whole people and the people have a right to demand that they should hallow them as the gratitude and affection of the whole people. Unless this be true, the American people, alone among civilized nations, are without any common objects of national reverence.

"The colleges of the period preceding the war of the Revolution were among the most potent forces in accomplishing our independence and founding our Constitution. Among them, none can claim precedence over William and Mary. The names of Washington to whom she gave and to whom she gave influence in peace we owe the vindication of our liberties and the successful inauguration of our Constitution; Jefferson, author of the Declaration of Independence, who announced the great law of equality and human rights; Marshall, without whose luminous and far-sighted exposition the Constitution could hardly have been put into successful and harmonious operation, are inseparably connected with hers. She first called Washington into the public service in his youth, giving him her commission as deputy surveyor; the office of surveyor-general being then held by the corporation of the college. He was for the last twelve years of his life chancellor of William and Mary. Jefferson and Marshall were her graduates. We doubt if any college in America or Europe can, in proportion to the whole number borne on its catalogue, show so large a list of names famous for conspicuous patriotic service or can extract from its history a passage like this, which is taken from President Ewell's historical sketch of William and Mary:

"Besides her long roll of most eminent divines, lawyers, and physicians in private life, she has given to the country two eminent Attorneys-General of the United States; to the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, nearly twenty members, and to the Senate of the United States, fifteen Senators; to Virginia and other States, seventeen governors; to the country, one historian and numberless eminent writers; to the State and the United States, thirty-seven judges; to the Revolution, twenty-seven of her sons; to the Army of the United States, a lieutenant-general and a score of principal and subordinate officers; to the United States Navy, a list of paladins of the sea, headed by Warrington and Thomas Ap Catesby Jones; to the colleges and university, twelve professors; to the nation, three Presidents—Jefferson, Monroe, and John Tyler; to independence, four signers of its Declaration; to the first American Congress, its President; to the Federal Judiciary, its most eminent Chief Justice, John Marshall; to the Federal Executive, seven Cabinet officers, and to the convention which framed the Constitution of the United States, Edmund Randolph, its chief author and draftsman.

"In all she has given to her country more than two hundred heroes and sages who have been preëminently distinguished in public service and place."

"Your committee are of opinion that if the accidents of war had led to the injury of Mount Vernon, of the house or the tomb of Washington, or of Independence Hall in Philadelphia, we should have hastened to repair the injury. We shall more truly honor Washington by restoring the living fountain of learning whose service was the pleasure of his last years than by any empty act of worship or respect toward his sepulcher.

"There is another view of this matter which impresses some of the members of your committee with very great force. It is unquestionable that, by the law of nations, institutions of learning are exempted by all civilized nations from the hostilities of war.

"They are to be classed, in this respect, with public libraries, monuments, collections of art or science, hospitals, etc. The Government of the United States, in its Instructions for the Government of Armies in the Field, originally prepared by Dr. Lieber, revised by a board of officers, of which Maj. Gen. Hitchcock was president, and approved by President Lincoln in 1863, binds itself by these rules:

"Extract from General Order No. 100, Adjutant-General's Office, section 2, paragraphs 34 to 36:

"34. As a general rule, the property belonging to churches, to hospitals, or other establishments of an exclusively charitable character, to establishments of education or foundations for the promotion of knowledge, whether public schools, universities, academies of learning, or observatories, museums of the fine arts, or of a scientific character, such property is not to be considered public property in the sense of paragraph 31; but it may be taxed or used when the public service may require it.

"35. Classical works of art, libraries, scientific collections, or precious instruments, such as astronomical telescopes, as well as hospitals, must be secured against all avoidable injury, even when they are contained in fortified places while besieged or bombarded.

"36. If such works of art, libraries, collections, or instruments belonging to a hostile nation or government can be removed without injury, the ruler of the conquering state or nation may order them to be seized and removed for the benefit of the said nation. The ultimate ownership is to be settled by the ensuing treaty of peace. In no case shall they be sold or given away, if captured by the armies of the United States; nor shall they ever be privately appropriated or wantonly destroyed or injured."

"It is needless to multiply citations. Every authority on the law of nations who touches this subject, from Grotius to Halleck, agrees that the destruction of property of this class is a violation of this law. But it can not be maintained that the Government is liable for all injuries committed either by its authority or wantonly by its troops, without orders, upon property protected by this rule. But there are many examples in history which seem to place the case of endowed institutions of learning, established by funds given for public purposes, upon grounds of their own, and give them a peculiar title to reparation when so injured which is not possessed by the public school or even by the church. The funds or buildings of the public school are public funds belonging to the hostile sovereign and appropriated to the fulfillment of a function which that sovereign undertakes to perform for the citizen. The funds or buildings of the church, though consecrated to the highest objects, are the property of particular sects and are neither within the control nor for the use of mankind at large. But, in the language of an eminent judge, 'the arts and sciences are admitted among all civilized nations as forming an exception to the severe rights of warfare, and as entitled to favor and protection. They are considered, not as the peculium of this or that nation, but as the property of mankind at large, and as belonging to the common interest of the whole species.' (Case of the Marquis de Smerueles, Stewart's Rep. Nova Scotia, page 482.)

"The endowed corporation of the college can do nothing except hold and apply its fund to a cause which is for the benefit of mankind at large. It can not commit an act of war, and the hostile character can not properly be imputed to it. While a violation of the law of nations in the conduct of the war for the suppression of the rebellion can not constitute a claim upon the Government of the United States, using the term 'claim' in the sense of legal constraint, we believe this Government should, in dealing with an American college, imitate the frequent examples which history furnishes, where the most highly civilized nations and the most famous commanders have respected their moral obligations by making voluntary reparation at their own expense of injuries inflicted on endowed colleges and kindred institutions by the operations of war.

"During the battle of Princeton, the Americans, in dislodging the British from the college building, fired a cannon shot through the walls; Washington, in order to make good to the college the damage sustained by the fire of his troops, made the trustees a present of 50 guineas.

"During the war of Independence the buildings of William and Mary were repeatedly occupied by British troops. They were in every instance respected as sacred to the cause of letters and left intact. After the close of the war, Louis XVI, the ally of America, caused the buildings accidentally destroyed by the fire of his troops to be replaced and every injury to be repaired.

"Thus it appears that a Virginian, the chancellor of the College of William and Mary, rendered to a Northern college the justice which is now asked for her. Thus it appears that a foreign monarch rendered, under like circumstances, to William and Mary herself the justice which she now asks of her countrymen of the Republic.

"The British troops under Tryon, when they occupied Yale College in 1779, spared Yale College, although its students in arms harassed their approach. But President Clap's manuscripts were carried off. President Stiles addressed a letter to General Tryon, in which he represented that 'a war against science had been reprobated for ages by the wisest and most powerful generals. The irreparable losses sustained by the Alexandrian library and other ancient monuments of literature have prompted the victorious commanders of modern ages to exempt these monuments from the ravages and desolations inseparable to the highest rigors of war.' General Tryon replied that, 'disposed by principle as well as inclination to prevent the violence of war from injuring the rights of the republics of learning, he very much approved of the president's solicitude for the recovery of the manuscripts,' and caused every effort to be made for their recovery and restoration.

"In the war with Great Britain of 1812 a quantity of paintings and prints, designed for the Academy of Arts at Philadelphia, were captured by the British on their passage from Italy and taken into Halifax. Dr. Croke, the distinguished judge of the admiralty court, without hesitation ordered them to be restored, saying, in addition to the passage already quoted, 'Heaven forbid that such an application to the generosity of Great Britain should ever be ineffectual.' (Case of the Marquis de Smerueles, above cited.)

"We believe that to follow the example of Washington, of Louis XVI, of Judge Croke, of Tryon, will make every college in America safer, if civil strife or foreign war should ever hereafter disturb our peace. Every new State, as it takes its place in the great family, makes haste to establish its university. Their pupils, scattered over the country, retain an attachment for them and for each other which is one of the strongest bonds of the Union. In her bloodiest and angriest civil strife England has respected her great schools and colleges. The cause of William and Mary is, in this respect, the cause of every college in the country.

"The act of April 23, 1884, entitled 'An act to increase the endowment of the University of Alabama from the public lands in said State,' and another act for the indemnity of the theological institution in Alexandria, furnish exact precedents for our action in reporting the accompanying bill and recommending its passage by the House.

"A bill like the present passed the House in the Forty-second Congress, but it was not reached in the Senate for want of time. It was received with expressions of approbation by the press of all parties and by persons connected with the colleges throughout the country."

URGENT DEFICIENCIES.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the appropriation bill reported yesterday, and printed, be laid before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 7818) to provide for certain of the most urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1892, and for other purposes; which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations be acted on as they are reached in the reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered in the absence of objection.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "State Department," on page 2, after line 3, to insert:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Treasury Department," on page 3, after line 24, to insert:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, after line 2, to insert:

Fish hatchery, Northville, Mich.: The act approved August 30, 1890, entitled, "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1891, and for other purposes," shall be construed as giving to the United States Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries authority to expend the sum of $5,000 therein appropriated for the erection of new buildings at Northville, Mich., for such constructions as may be necessary for the development of the work of the Fish Commission at that place, including the introduction of a water supply, the construction of ponds, and repairs to the present buildings.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Department of the Interior," on page 8, to strike out the clause from line 8 to line 14, inclusive, as follows:

Rent of buildings: That if the whole of the $16,000 already appropriated for rents for the General Land Office shall not be expended for that purpose, the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to expend such part of the unexpended balance thereof as may be necessary to rent rooms for office or storage purposes for any of the bureaus or offices of the Interior Department.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, after line 14, to insert:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Department of Justice," on page 8, line 22, before the word "roof," to strike out "iron" and insert "metallic," so as to make the clause read:

For covering alleyway adjoining Department of Justice building for use of the Court of Claims, including flooring, glass, and metallic roof, front and rear walls, or sash, steam heat, party wall, painting, set of cases full length of the room, and cutting doorway, to be done under the supervision of the Architect of the Capitol, $4,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, to strike out the clause from line 1 to line 4, on page 9, as follows:

Eleventh Census: For salaries and necessary expenses for continuing the work of compiling the results of the Eleventh Census, $100,000, to be available until expended.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Post-Office Department," to strike out the clause from line 8, on page 9, to line 2, on page 10, inclusive, as follows:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Calendar under Rule VIII being in order, the first case will be reported.

The bill (S. 1430) for the relief of Leonard I. Brownson, late first lieutenant, Company K, Fifth Vermont Volunteers, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized to revoke and set aside so much of General Orders No. 21, Headquarters Middle Military Division, dated September 18, 1864, as dismissed First Lieut. Leonard I. Brownson, Company K, Fifth Vermont Volunteers, for absence without leave and for conduct prejudicial to good order and military discipline, and to grant and cause to be issued to said Leonard I. Brownson a certificate of honorable muster out of the service as of the date of September 18, 1864; and said Leonard I. Brownson shall not be entitled, by virtue of this act, to any pay or allowance subsequent to said September 18, 1864.

PROPERTY RIGHTS OF MARRIED WOMEN IN THE DISTRICT.

The bill (S. 2280) to amend sections 727 and 729 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the District of Columbia, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Sections numbered 727 and 729 of the Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia are by the bill amended so as to read:

SEC. 727. In the District of Columbia the right of any married woman to any property, personal or real, belonging to her at the time of marriage or acquired during marriage by her trade, business, labor, or services carried on or performed on her sole and separate account, or in any other way than by gift or conveyance from her husband, shall be as absolute as if she were unmarried, and shall not be subject to the disposal of her husband nor be liable for his debts.

SEC. 729. The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section (4) 3, in line 9, after the word "individuals," to strike out "and the knowledge and acts of agents and employes of such corporations and companies, in regard to animals owned or employed by them, shall be held to be the knowledge and acts of such corporations and companies themselves;" so as to make the section read:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will be attended to by the enrolling clerk in the enrollment of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HARRIS. I think the title ought to be amended by adding the words "or animals" after the word "children."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee suggests that the title of the bill should be amended. The Chair hears no objection, and the title will be amended to read as follows: "A bill to prevent cruelty to children or animals in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes."

And provided further, That where he is unable to purchase such lands at what he may deem a reasonable price, or where the owner or owners of said lands or any part thereof may be unable for any reason to vest by voluntary conveyance a complete and valid title to any part of said lands hereinbefore described, then the same shall be acquired by condemnation, agreeably to the act of Congress of August 1, 1888, relative to such condemnations, and to the laws of the State of Virginia for the condemnation of land for public uses in that State.

SALE OF PROPERTY UNDER UNITED STATES COURT DECREES.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I desire to offer amendments to the bill (H. R. 5816) to regulate the manner in which property shall be sold under orders and decrees of any United States court, and I ask that the amendments be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator desire to have them referred?

Mr. WOLCOTT. No, I prefer that they shall lie on the table, as the bill is on the Calendar.

Mr. WOLCOTT subsequently said: Referring to House bill 5816, to which I offered amendments a few moments ago, after further consideration and consultation with some members of the committee, I move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary, with the amendments I have offered. I think that will facilitate action.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PLATT in the chair). The Senator from Colorado asks that the bill referred to by him, together with the amendments intended to be proposed by him, be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order will be made.

PRESIDENTIAL SUCCESSION.

The bill (H. The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WORLD'S COLUMBIAN EXPOSITION.

The joint resolution (S. R. 42) extending an invitation to the King and Queen of Spain and the descendants of Columbus to participate in the World's Columbian Exposition was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported from the Select Committee on the Quadro-Centennial with an amendment, in line 9, before the word "that," to insert "and;" and in line 11, after the word "entertainment," to strike out "and that a sufficient sum to pay the expenses thereof is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the same to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State, according to the provisions of section 291 of the Revised Statutes;" so as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized and requested to extend to His Majesty Alfonso XIII. to Her Majesty the Queen Regent of Spain, and to the living descendants of Christopher Columbus an invitation to attend the opening ceremonies of the World's Columbian Exposition as the guests of the Government and people of the United States; and that under his direction the Secretary of State shall make suitable arrangements for their reception and entertainment.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, at the end of line 5, after the word "to," I move to insert the names of the living descendants of Christopher Columbus, so that there shall be no controversy about either who they are or their numbers. The names are found in a letter from Mr. Curtis, who has furnished me the information in regard to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. After the word "to," in line 5, it is proposed to insert:

(Christobal Colon de La Cerda, the Duc de Veragua; second, the Marquis de Barboles, his brother; and third, Don Christobal de Larreategui y Aguilar, his son, their wives and children, if any.)

The amendment was agreed to.

LOAN OF ARTICLES FOR THE COLUMBIAN EXPOSITION.

The joint resolution (S. R. 43) requesting the loan of certain articles for the World's Columbian Exposition was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported from the Select Committee on the Quadro-Centennial with amendment, in line 8, after the words "loan of," to strike out "the" and insert "any;" in line 13, after the word "reception," to insert "transportation;" after the word "exhibition," at the end of the same line, to insert "safe-keeping;" and in line 18, after the word "protection," to strike out the remainder of the joint resolution, as follows: "And that a sum of money sufficient to pay the expenses attending the reception and entertainment of these guests shall be appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the same to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State, according to the provisions of section 291 of the Revised Statutes."

So as to make the joint resolution read:

Be it resolved, etc. That the President be, and he hereby is, authorized to request of the Government of Her Majesty the Queen Regent of Spain, of the municipal government of Genoa, of the Duke of Veragua, the descendant of Columbus, and of such other persons or corporations as may be thought proper, the loan of any articles, papers, books, maps, documents and other relics of Christopher Columbus and those who were associated with him, or with the discovery and early settlement of America, for exhibition at the World's Columbian Exposition; that the Secretary of State shall make such provision as may be necessary for their reception, transportation, exhibition, safe-keeping, and return; that the Secretary of the Navy shall be authorized, if necessary, to detail one or more vessels for their transportation; and that the Secretary of War shall detail whatever military guard may be necessary for their care and protection.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is a pretty sweeping joint resolution. Unless there is some urgent necessity for it, I think it ought to go over. I should like to hear some explanation of it.

Mr. SHERMAN. The chairman of the committee is not at hand. I would rather he should make the explanation; but I think there is a great deal of urgency from the State Department that these joint resolutions should be acted upon, so that the invitations may be given.

Mr. COCKRELL. This provides:

That the President be, and he hereby is, authorized to request of the Government of Her Majesty the Queen Regent of Spain, of the municipal government of Genoa, of the Duke of Veragua, the descendant of Columbus, and of such other persons or corporations as may be thought proper, the loan of any articles, papers, books, maps, documents, and other relics of Christopher Columbus, etc.

Mr. SHERMAN. The articles, I think, will be given. The description of the articles can be given by Mr. Curtis. I understand there is no doubt about the number and even the inventory of the articles that will be exhibited under this provision.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the joint resolution will be passed. I think there is nothing in it which is not fully understood.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INVITATIONS TO WORLD'S COLUMBIAN EXPOSITION.

The joint resolution (S. R. 41) extending an invitation to the Presidents of the American Republics and the governors of the American colonies to participate in the World's Columbian Exposition was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported from the Select Committee on the Quadro-Centennial with amendments: In line 11, before the word "that," to insert "and," and after the word "that" to insert "under his direction;" in line 13, after the word "suitable," to strike out "arrangement" and insert "arrangements;" in the same line, before the word "reception," to strike out "the"

and insert "their;" and in line 14, after the word "entertainment," to strike out the words:

Of these distinguished guests, and that a sum of money sufficient to pay the expenses attending the reception and entertainment of these guests shall be appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the same to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State according to the provisions of section 291 of the Revised Statutes.

So as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc. That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized and requested to extend an invitation to the presidents of the several other American republics, and to the governors of colonies, to participate in the ceremonies attending the dedication of the buildings of the World's Columbian Exposition on the 11th, 12th, and 13th of October, 1892, and the ceremonies attending the opening of the Exposition on the 1st of May, 1893; and that, under his direction, the Secretary of State shall make suitable arrangements for their reception and entertainment.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to know why it is considered important that there should be two invitations to these officials of our sister republics, one for October and one for May?

Mr. SHERMAN. This resolution does not require two invitations, but it requires an invitation to two different celebrations, because the law provides for two different celebrations. The law provides for a celebration in October next and also for the formal opening of the Exposition in May next. These are two events, which really make one invitation, so that there are not two invitations.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM C. TARKINGTON

The bill (S. 2592) granting an increase of pension to William C. Tarkington was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of William C. Tarkington, of Indianapolis, Ind., late captain and quartermaster in the volunteer service of the United States during the war of the rebellion, at $30 per month, in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SAMUEL M. CAMPBELL.

The bill (S. 2593) granting an increase of pension to Samuel M. Campbell was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Samuel M. Campbell, of Marion County, Ind., late a private in Company C, Seventh Regiment Indiana Volunteers, at $30 per month, in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PLATT in the chair). The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. TURPIE, March 15, 1892:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition for granting an increase of pension to Samuel M. Campbell, of Marion County, Ind., have examined the same and report:

The soldier enlisted as a private in the Seventh Indiana Regiment on the 4th day of September, 1861. He served until December 31, 1862, when he was discharged for disability incurred in the service, as shown by his discharge. He reenlisted as a private in the Second Battery Indiana Light Artillery, and served until July 3, 1865, when he was again honorably discharged. He is now a pensioner at the rate of $17 per month, and his claim for increase has been rejected by the Pension Bureau on the ground that he is now receiving the highest rate that can be technically allowed him for his disability.

The soldier is 47 years old, and it appears from the evidence that his wife is an invalid unable to work; that neither have any property; there are no children; the two are dependent upon the husband's pension for subsistence. The soldier is unable to do any kind of manual labor.

It appears from the testimony of his comrades on file, and also from that of physicians, that he is now suffering from varicocele of the left side; also, that he has fistula of the rectum, one opening high up, from which there is a constant discharge. He has a rapid heart, which beats ninety to the minute; is partially blind in the left eye. He has a bronchial affection, an emaciated and haggard appearance. He is described as a physical wreck and as suffering from total disability.

Under the circumstances the committee think there ought to be an increase of the pension in this case to the rate of $30 per month, and therefore report a bill for his relief and recommend its passage.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MRS. S. A. FARQUHARSON.

The bill (S. 1303) to increase the pension of Mrs. S. A. Farquharson was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 9, after the name "Farquharson," to strike out "and to allow the said Mrs. S. A. Farquharson the difference between $8 and $25 per month from the date of the death of the said Maj. Robert Farquharson;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc. That the Commissioner of Pensions be, and he is hereby, directed to pay to Mrs. S. A. Farquharson, widow of the late Maj. Robert Farquharson, of the First Regiment Tennessee Volunteers, Mexican war, a pension of $25 per month, that being the pension paid to the late Maj. Robert Farquharson, in lieu of the pension of $8 per month heretofore paid to Mrs. S. A. Farquharson.

SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect from its passage.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. As I understood the reading of the first line of that bill, it is an instruction to the Commissioner of Pensions. The PRESIDING OFFICER. The part of the bill referred to will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

That the Commissioner of Pensions be, and he is hereby, directed, etc.

Mr. HARRIS. I suppose that is sufficient, but I was in doubt as to whether it should not be "the Secretary of the Interior."

Mr. BATE. I move to strike out "Commissioner of Pensions" and insert "Secretary of the Interior."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 3, after the words "that the," it is proposed to strike out "Commissioner of Pensions" and insert "Secretary of the Interior;" so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SAMUEL P. GLENN.

The bill (S. 1188) granting a pension to Samuel P. Glenn was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 5, before the word "dollars," to strike out "ten" and insert "twenty;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension roll, at the rate of $20 per month, in lieu of the pension which he now receives, the name of Samuel P. Glenn, late private Company E, Fourth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

JOHN KINNEY.

The bill (S. 1675) granting an increase of pension to John Kinney, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension rolls the name of John Kinney, late a member of Company I, First Regiment of United States Infantry, in the war with Mexico, at $12 per month, such pension to be in lieu of the one he is now receiving.

Mr. VILAS. I ask that the report in reference to that bill be read, for I desire the Senate to observe that it is proposed by the bill to increase the pension of a Mexican war soldier, simply on the ground that he is destitute and under special circumstances of need.

Mr. PADDOCK. "Destitute and aged," for which there are many precedents.

Mr. VILAS. That is the case with all the soldiers of that class.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. PADDOCK, March 15, 1892:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1675) granting an increase of pension to John Kinney, have examined the same and report:

Claimant served as a private in Company I, First Regiment United States Infantry, from February 27 to October 29, 1847, in the war with Mexico, and is now drawing a pension of $8 per month, under the act of January 29, 1887, allowing pensions to survivors of Mexican war.

Increase of pension is asked on the ground that claimant is wholly disabled for manual labor, and being in destitute circumstances $8 per month is not sufficient to provide him the necessities of life.

In affidavit executed January 14, 1892, J. D. Pickett, of Fairfield, Iowa, testifies that claimant is an old man, broken down in health, and it is only a question of time when he will require the constant care and attendance of another person; that he is totally unable to perform any manual labor, and that the $8 per month which he is now drawing is inadequate to supply his wants.

In affidavit executed January 14, 1892, B. F. Cox, of Fairfield, Iowa, testifies substantially as above.

In a petition signed by Rollin J. Wilson, H. B. Keltner, E. D. Hoops, John F. Loehr, Aaron Scott, George B. Waltz, Frank O. Croy, S. L. Macchesney, H. B. Mitchell, Halle W. Dale, J. F. Wilson, jr., W. F. Goodban, J. C. Millikin, M. D. R. D. Jenkins, James M. Hinkle, J. D. Pickett, A. W. Jaques, Nat Pierce, Perry King, Levi Thomas, Adam Lines, G. R. Manner, J. L. Haney, T. F. Higley, Daniel B. Wilson, C. E. Noble, William N. Woodside, W. H. Mohr, G. A. Unkrich, John C. Leeds, T. M. Gray, Paul Sheridan, James Barr, H. W. Weikert, Horace H. Fulton, A. Z. Tarrell, Orlander Flower, J. E. Thomas, Eugene Campbell, M. D., E. F. Ammons, A. C. D. Bradshaw, W. Warwick, and M. C. Carpenter, M. D., the passage of the bill is asked on the ground that claimant is wholly unable for manual labor by reason of physical disabilities, and is without means of support other than his pension of $8 per month which he is now drawing.

The facts seem to warrant favorable action, and your committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, I wish to ask the attention of the Senate to the proposition involved in this bill. We have been piling up pension appropriations until the country staggers under the load, and industry everywhere in the United States is suffering by the oppression of taxation imposed by the National Government. Now, I do not ask that there shall be any cessation of proper pensions, but I do ask attention to the fact that it is a gross injustice to the soldiers of the late war who have not been admitted to pensions that an increase shall be granted whenever somebody files a particular petition to support a bill, asserting that the claimant is needy and destitute and can not perform manual labor. Observe that there is no other reason given for the passage of this bill than simply this, that increase of pension is asked on the ground that the claimant is wholly disabled for manual labor, and being in destitute circumstances, $8 per month is not sufficient to provide him the necessities of life.

If that be a good reason in this case, I shall ask that the bill be amended so that, instead of coming here, every Mexican war pensioner shall have the right to go to the Commissioner of Pensions, who can examine the evidence better than the Committee on Pensions of the Senate or the Senate itself, in every case where the claimant is wholly disabled for manual labor, and being in destitute circumstances $8 per month is not sufficient to provide him the necessities of life. Why every one should not have it as well as this one, I leave the Senate to decide.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I took occasion the other day to say that I had never been very enthusiastic on the subject of wholesale pensions, and I repeat it now, but I hope that the time will never come when any man who has fought for this country in any war and is reduced to the condition this claimant seems by unquestionable proof to be now in, shall become the inmate of a pauper asylum or poorhouse. It would be a scandal and disgrace to every individual citizen of the United States if such a thing should happen, and I am prepared to say, and I think I voice the sentiment almost unanimously of this Chamber, certainly this side of it, when I say that whenever any claimant who served in the last war shall present the proof found in this case he will receive the vote of every Senator here in favor of an increase of his pension.

The gross abuses of the pension law furnish no argument against relief in a case like this. Against those abuses I have unavailingly lifted my voice and given my vote repeatedly in this Chamber. The people of the United States are entirely willing in all sections and in every locality to vote the largest pension to the real deserving soldiers of the last war who come to the unfortunate condition of this present claimant, but they are not willing, and it can not be said too often, to vote millions of dollars out of the public Treasury to men who are entirely able to support themselves, but not willing to do so. That is the entire issue in regard to pensions before the honest people of this country to-day.

When the Senator from Wisconsin speaks of a general law, he knows that that involves delay, not only delay but probably defeat to any such measure. There are to-day few of the Mexican war veterans living, a very inconsiderable number of them, and in no war ever waged by this country was the glory of the American soldier better illustrated, and certainly never was there larger increase of material wealth to the people of the United States than in the result of the Mexican war. If we to-day should increase the service pension of the Mexican war soldiers to twice the amount now received, it would only be just and proper.

Mr. KENNA. If the Senator will allow me, I wish to suggest to him in that connection that the pensions awarded to the Mexican war soldiers are not only of recent origin, but in their case there were no arrears allowed.

Mr. VEST. No; there have never been any arrears of pension granted to them.

Mr. BATE. Not only that, but their pension is only $8 a month and the soldiers of the last war get $12.

Mr. VEST. Exactly. If there were an analysis of the pension provisions now upon the statute book as between the soldiers of the different wars which have been waged for this country, it would show that gross injustice has been done to the soldiers of the Mexican war. If we put anything like a commercial valuation upon their services, leaving aside the fact that the soldiers of the last war preserved the life of the country, as the phrase now goes, in point of territory and absolute money paid into the Treasury of the United States, all our wars have not equalled in result that of the Mexican war alone; and to say now that we will deny an increase of pension to this old man, who did his duty as a soldier in that war faithfully to the country, and who is now destitute, and expected under existing legislation to live upon a pension of $8, it seems to me, sir, is almost an appalling proposition in a country like ours.

I am not only willing to vote for this bill, but I would be willing to double the pension to every veteran of the Mexican war. I know there is a prejudice against that war. I know it is said, and I have heard it said in this Chamber, that it was a war for the extension of human slavery. I know that it is said in some quarters that it was a political war. Mr. President, the men who went into Mexico and bore the American flag in honor and glory across those plains had nothing to do with the political aspect of it. The men who went to Mexico were not politicians. This man went there for no political purpose, but simply to serve his country, and now in his old age he appeals to that country that he shall not become the inmate of a poorhouse. I regret, Mr. President, that hesitation should exist for one moment in regard to a case like this.

Mr. PADDOCK. Mr. President, I desire only to say in behalf of the committee that the assumption of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] that this is a new departure, a new precedent, in the line of pension legislation, is altogether a mistake. There have been a number of such cases as this, where the beneficiaries had reached an advanced age, were infirm and dependent on relatives, or were absolutely destitute and without any means of support whatever. Bills have been passed, not a great many, but those cases have all been very carefully considered. It has been, however, the rule in the Pension Committee ever since I have had the honor to be a member of it, and where cases like this were presented, appealing to the sympathy and to the humanity of everybody, that there should be a moderate increase.

So far as I am concerned, I do not hesitate to say here now that I would vote for an amendment to the general law which would increase the pension from $8 to $12 per month for every one of the soldiers of that war who now survives.

As to the peculiar situation of this claimant, the particular circumstances which surround his case, my friend the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] resides in the same town in which he lives, and will be able to make a statement.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I have some personal knowledge of the person named in this bill, and I can state from that knowledge that the Senate will make no mistake about doing a proper act by the passage of this bill. The case in all of its elements is meritorious, and I hope there will be no hesitation in giving the bill its passage.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I desire to take this opportunity to say that there are two classes of men who served the country in a military capacity who have been neglected to a very great extent. Those are the soldiers of the Mexican war and the soldiers of the several Indian wars which have occurred in the history of this country.

Those men are very few in number, and many of them are of the most extreme and advanced age. They are almost universally and entirely destitute, and very generally incapable of manual labor. I have sought upon various occasions to have both of these classes of men advanced to a reasonable pension, but up to this time have failed.

I can see no possible objection to granting to an old soldier of the Mexican war who is diseased, disabled, the presumption existing that it is largely because of his military service, a pension adequate to his absolute necessity. So of the soldiers of the Indian wars, many of whom are to-day in a condition of the most extreme destitution, and all of them of a very advanced age.

I shall cheerfully vote for this bill, notwithstanding my objection to increasing the expenditures of the Government. I shall also be glad to vote for a bill granting a pension to the survivors of the Indian wars in such cases.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, I am neither prepared nor am I in physical condition to-day to enter into any discussion of the general questions involved in pension legislation, and I shall attempt nothing of the kind. I intended no more by asking that the report be read, and by the remarks which I had the honor to submit, than to attract the attention of the Senate to the fact that no reason was assigned why this pension should be increased, except that single one, twice repeated in the report, that the claimant is wholly disabled for manual labor, and, being in destitute circumstances, $8 per month is, in the language of the report, not sufficient to provide him with the necessities of life.

Mr. WALTHALL. Does not the report say something about his age?

Mr. VILAS. The age is not given. There are cases where extreme age furnishes special reasons for such action.

Mr. BATE. Allow me to make a suggestion to the Senator from Wisconsin. Take the date at which soldiers entered the Mexican war, take the date at which they retired, and they must be at least 64 or 65 years old, if they entered at the proper age.

Mr. COCKRELL. Sixty-six years old, the report states.

Mr. BATE. Some were younger, like my friend the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE], who sits before me, but I say the majority of them, nine out of ten, are over 65 years old to-day, and they are but few in number. I know many of them personally; I know their necessities.

I agree with the Senator from Wisconsin in regard to the pension laws and the propriety of having a revision. I agree that our taxpayers are groaning and staggering under the weight of the burden thus imposed, as he says. That is all true; but here are these soldiers who have brought immense wealth to the country, and now after this lapse of time when so many are in extreme old age, if one of them is not able to support himself he ought to be sustained by the Government. It is just and proper.

I only rose to call attention to the fact that they are necessarily men of extreme age. My attention was called to the fact by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WALTHALL] asking the age of this applicant.

Mr. VILAS. I recognize the age of these men and alluded to it in what I first said on the subject. I recognize also and allow the full measure of glory which is due to the soldiers who served in the Mexican war. I recognize the justice of the remarks made by the distinguished and the eloquent Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST]. All that I ask the Senate to do is to be just, and not to be indulging in personal favoritism for influences which all these soldiers can not have. Therefore, to follow the exact language of the report, I propose this amendment to the bill: To strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized to increase the pension of every pensioner who is now on the rolls at $8 per month on account of service in the Mexican war, and who is wholly disabled from manual labor, and is in such destitute circumstances that $8 per month are insufficient to provide him the necessities of life, to $12 per month.

That is the exact language of this report. If it is right for one, it is right for all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized to increase the pension of every pensioner who is now on the rolls at $8 per month on account of service in the Mexican war, and who is wholly disabled from manual labor, and is in such destitute circumstances that $8 per month are insufficient to provide him the necessities of life, to $12 per month.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. WILSON. I feel quite willing to join the Senator from Wisconsin in effecting liberal legislation for the veterans of the Mexican war; but I suggest to him that this is not a proper method for the treatment of this bill. The adoption of his amendment simply means the defeat of the bill at the present time. If the Senator from Wisconsin is so anxious to treat the veterans of the Mexican war as he provides in this amendment, let him prepare and introduce a bill which will cover all the cases and I shall be willing to walk along hand in hand with him; but I do ask the Senate not to single out this particular case in order to defeat it by imposing upon the bill now the amendment which the Senator proposes.

Mr. VEST. Why not add the provisions of the amendment to the bill as it now stands before the Senate? It is very probable, not to say possible, that if this amendment should be adopted it takes the place of the entire original bill, and that this claimant will probably be in his grave before the law is enacted. It is unjust to him to make this the occasion of this legislation, however much I may be in favor of it. If the Senator will agree to add the amendment to the bill, I shall certainly vote for it, though I will vote for it in any event; but without any personal acquaintance with this claimant at all, I think it would be unjust, as the Senator from Iowa states, to endanger the pending bill by the amendment. There never has been a case, at least since I have had my attention called to the pension business, since I have been a member of the Senate, where such facts as are stated in this bill have failed to elicit the relief asked for any soldier of any war in which this country has been engaged.

This sort of legislation is simply like the exercise of the equity jurisdiction of a court; it is simply the correction of that wherein the law by reason of its universality is deficient. It is applying the relief to the specific facts which are brought up in each case to the equitable knowledge of the court. Now, this claimant shows a state of facts in his behalf which entitles him to relief, and I am for giving him that relief now. I am for giving it to every other veteran who comes here with the same sort of showing to the Congress of the United States. Then, I am in favor, in addition to that, of the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin, and when that is adopted there will be no necessity for any special legislation.

Mr. HARRIS. I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will offer his amendment as a second section to the bill, and not as a substitute. It will encounter very much less opposition, if it encounters any opposition at all, in that form. I shall be glad to vote for it in that form, and shall of course vote for it in either form, but I prefer that it shall be added as a separate section.

Mr. WILSON. The suggestion submitted by the Senator from Tennessee, if it should be effected, will result in the defeat of this bill ultimately. Let the Senator from Wisconsin put his proposition in a separate bill, and let that case, as he may present it, stand by itself; but do not deprive this aged and disabled man of the opportunity of the small relief which this bill proposes to extend.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator allow me to ask him why it must defeat this bill? Is it not perfectly simple and easy, if this amendment is attached, that the Senate may insist upon it and ask a conference with the House of Representatives upon the disagreeing votes? It need not defeat and need not delay the bill one week's time.

Mr. WILSON. The difficulty is, Mr. President, that it will lead to unnecessary delay in the matter of the relief of this particular individual; and considering the facts in his case as I know them I do hope that this amendment will not, in either form, be placed upon the bill, but that the Senator from Wisconsin, after this bill may be disposed of, or at such time as he may elect, will introduce an independent bill extending the relief he suggests.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the bill (H. R. 6185) to absolutely prohibit the coming of Chinese persons into the United States, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER]. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and the Chair recognizes the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. PADDOCK. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire to yield temporarily to the bill which has been under consideration.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have no objection to the unfinished business being delayed for a few moments if debate is not to be prolonged.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business will be temporarily laid aside, unless there be objection, for the purpose of continuing the consideration of the pending bill.

Mr. DOLPH. I shall have to object if it is going to take any time.

Mr. PADDOCK. I want to address an appeal in a single word to the Senator from Wisconsin, that he withdraw his amendment and allow this bill to pass while this man is still living, that he may get the relief. Of course, if this amendment should prevail and the bill go to the other House, it comes under a different parliamentary rule, which would necessarily delay it, and very likely it might delay it to the end of the session, if not longer. By the rule under which it would naturally go as a special act, it would require hardly any time at all to pass the bill, and it seems to me it is an act of very great unfairness to a beneficiary situated as this man is to lumber up his bill and cause its defeat as proposed.

So far as I am concerned, I am in favor of the proposition of the Senator from Wisconsin. I would delight to vote for that amendment as a general proposition, but situated as I am here to-day, representing the committee, I shall be compelled to vote against the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin, because I have not the authority to do otherwise than to present the bill as it is.

Mr. VEST. This whole controversy is over $48 a year. That is the extent of this controversy. I think by an accurate calculation we have spent about three times that amount in discussing it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS].

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, I simply want to add a word why I do not accede to the suggestion of some of the Senators in regard to the place where this amendment should be applied to the bill. I do not stand here to urge the increase of these pensions. I am not pressing for any such measure. I am simply insisting upon justice as between pensioners. In all that has been said with reference to this particular case, you find the same reason in reference to every other case, for I have adopted as the basis of the amendment the exact language of the report as furnishing the reason for the passage of the bill in this case. If that be a sufficient foundation for the increase of a pension the claimant in this particular case is neither entitled to have a pension when others in exactly the same circumstances do not have it nor is he entitled to be preferred one minute to the others in point of time. They stand all on the same footing and on the same line.

Mr. DOLPH. Let the amendment be read as it stands now. The Secretary read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to increase the pension of every pensioner who is now on the rolls at $8 per month on account of services in the Mexican war, and who is wholly disabled from manual labor, and is in such destitute circumstances that $8 per month are insufficient to provide him the necessities of life, to $12 per month.

Mr. BUTLER. I shall vote for that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HARRIS. The title should be amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The title will be amended.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to soldiers of the Mexican war in certain cases."

EXCLUSION OF CHINESE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6185) to absolutely prohibit the coming of Chinese persons into the United States, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. CHANDLER in section 1, line 3, of the text, after the word "that," to insert the words "for fifteen years;" so as to read:

That for fifteen years from and after the passage of this act it shall be unlawful for any Chinese person or persons, etc.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, it has not seemed to me very material whether this bill goes into the hands of a committee of conference by the adoption of the Senate committee substitute or by amendments of the House bill. It is conceded that the House bill has harsh provisions in it which will not meet with the approval of the Senate. It did not occur to me that there would be any objection to amending the House bill by depriving it of any features which are too severe and objectionable and making it one which might receive the approval of a majority of the members of the Senate.

Mr. President, I am of the opinion that the situation as regards immigration requires that more stringent laws should be passed against the Chinese, and I am particularly desirous of saving the seventh section of the House bill, which is as follows:

Sec. 7. That any Chinese person, or persons of Chinese descent, entering the United States or any of its Territories by crossing its boundary lines, or entering therein in any other manner whatever contrary to the provisions of this act, or found unlawfully in the United States or its Territories, may be arrested upon a warrant issued upon a complaint under oath filed by any party on behalf of the United States, by any justice, judge, or commissioner of any United States court, or before any United States court; and when convicted, upon a hearing, and found and adjudged to be one not lawfully entitled to be or remain in the United States, such person shall be imprisoned in a penitentiary for a term not exceeding five years, and at the expiration of such term of imprisonment be removed from the United States to the country from whence he came: Provided, That when Chinese persons found unlawfully in the United States shall have come into the United States from China by way of contiguous foreign territory they shall be returned to China.

I think that the term of imprisonment is too severe, and I propose to move, as appears by the printed amendment before the Senate, to strike out "five years" and insert "two years," and I see no objection to reducing the term still more, provided some term of imprisonment is still retained in the bill.

It has been discovered that there is a very large migration of Chinese into the United States through Canada and Mexico. I hold in my hand various communications from the Secretary of the Treasury to the Senate giving accounts of the migration from Mexico and from Canada of many Chinamen, and I will read a few. I read from Senate Executive Document 97, Part 9, Fifty-first Congress, first session, a letter of Secretary Windom, dated June 2, 1890, to the Senate, inclosing the report of Consul Myers, at Victoria, British Columbia, of May 16, 1890. The consul says:

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
Victoria, British Columbia, May 16, 1890.

SIR: As the Chinese question continues of interest to the Department, I beg leave to report, somewhat in detail, the manner in which twenty-two of the Celestials passed over into the United States from this place Monday night, May 12, or at least they are reported to have gone by those who saw part of the transaction, and I give the circumstances in corroboration.

These Chinese, part of the last arrival at Vancouver, were taken across the Straits of Fuca by the steam propeller North Star. She is a British craft of only 53 tons, net burden, 40 feet long, breadth of beam 9.7 feet, depth 4 feet. She is owned in halves by Frederick Jones and Angel Kaftee, the latter being her sailing master. She is known as a craft of piratical tendencies, smuggling, etc.

On the 7th of May she took out a clearance for Saturne Island, and then hid away in her anchorage until the night of the 12th. The Chinese were taken on board at about midnight and she then quietly slipped out of the harbor.

There is also a report in the same document, 97, part 7, from the Chinese inspector, Mr. Datus E. Coon, at San Diego, Cal., to the Secretary of the Treasury, dated April 2, 1892, in which he speaks of the difficulties alluded to in a letter of one James Russell to Hon. William Vandever, a member of Congress. This Chinese inspector says:

Mr. Russell mentions that the "Scott exclusion act" is a failure. That is practically true as to its execution: for example, should an officer take a Chinaman to the State line to-day, he will undoubtedly follow that officer back to the city the first dark night, and make his way to some point inland where recognition and the facts of his recent arrival could not be substantiated.

The arrest, confinement in jail, and arraignment before the commissioner furnishes the most ample opportunity for the stranger Chinaman to make all necessary arrangements through his friendly countrymen to be returned to the United States the second time, and conducted to some interior town where our officers could not find him, if identification were possible. A Chinaman wishing to disguise himself can easily deceive his own friends. In going from one town to another they generally change their name and ap-parcel, so that identification by United States officials is extremely difficult at best.

We have learned from letters found upon the persons of these prisoners that the smuggling into the United States of Chinamen is a profitable traffic of no small dimensions, and is backed by very heavy capital, the principal headquarters being in San Francisco and China.

The evidence seems to be that contracts are made in China to deliver safely each Chinaman on American soil, and a guaranty given. If the delivery is made in safety the money ($140) is paid. The Chinamen are provided in China with tickets to various ports in Mexico, and on arrival in the harbor of San Francisco have been transferred "in transit," as most convenient, to a "coaster," as was the case recently of the steamship Newbern, taking Chinamen in the harbor of San Francisco from the steamship City of Pekin and dropping them in Ensenada, Lower California; or at other times, should the Panama Steamship Line have a steamer in port, these people would be taken down the coast further, from whence they will work their way back to the United States, as has already been demonstrated to us.

But the real destination of the Chinaman is the United States, and no matter where he lands, be it Mexico or Canada, he will at the earliest possible moment work his way to his original destination.

In Document 97, part 6, there is inclosed in a letter from the Treasury Department of May 8, 1890, a letter from George W. Whitehead, special agent at Suspension Bridge, N. Y., dated April 30, 1890, in which he says:

SIR: I have the honor to report that Special Employé Lewis, of this office, arrested two Chinamen yesterday, who had smuggled themselves into the United States from Canada, and that said Chinamen have been placed in custody of the United States marshal, pending examination before a commission. A large number of letters in the Chinese language were found, but nothing of a contraband nature.

I respectfully invite attention in this connection to the fact that, according to my information, there are a large number of Chinamen in Toronto, Ontario, recently arrived from Victoria, British Columbia, who will, it is believed, find their way into the United States. Wing Tai & Co., of 405 Yonge street, and Lee Wing, 128 Queen street, Toronto, are prominent leaders of their countrymen, and are said to receive $30 per head for landing them across the line.

In Document 97, part 8, Secretary Windom sends to the Senate in a letter of May 23, 1890, the report of Consul Viosca as to the arrival at Mazatlan, Mexico, "of one hundred and thirty-two Chinese, more or less, destined for the various Gulf ports of Mexico, who, so far as he is informed, intend to proceed thence to the United States, it being insinuated that eighty-five of them are on their way to the State of Ohio." I read the letter from Consul James Viosca to the State Department:

UNITED STATES CONSULATE,
La Paz, Mexico, April 21, 1890.

SIR: I deem it my duty to report to the Department of State that the steamer City of Sydney arrived at Mazatlan on the 18th instant with, more or less, one hundred and thirty-two Chinese destined for the various Gulf ports of Mexico. Of the above number twenty-seven were landed at the said port of Mazatlan, and one hundred and five were transhipped to the Mexican steamer Alejandro on the same date, twenty of whom were bound for Altata and the balance, eighty-five, for Guaymas.

From authentic information received from the officers of the said steamer Alejandro, there is no doubt that the eighty-five Chinese going to Guaymas are going with the intention of being introduced through the frontier into the United States, and it is even insinuated that they are on their way to the State of Ohio. Their place of precedence being Australia, a number of them speak the English language.

Part 5 of the Document No. 97 contains another letter from Secretary Windom, of April 29, 1890, in which he says:

It will be seen that while perhaps the number of Chinese so entering can only be a matter of conjecture, yet there is very little doubt but that, owing to the extended frontier, which it is impossible to guard with the limited means at the disposal of the Department, they are occasionally crossing the boundary in small parties without detection.

In part 4 of the document there is a communication from Collector Phelps, of San Francisco, to the Secretary of the Treasury, of April 12, 1890, which says:

The City of Pekin, arriving March 25 ultimo, brought seventy-nine Chinese holding through tickets to Guaymas, Mexico, who were transferred to steamer Newbern; all landed at Ensenada, and a part of them, in attempting to enter the United States, have been arrested and are now in jail at San Diego. On 10th instant Oceanic arrived, having on board eighty-seven Chinese holding through tickets for Guaymas. It is sought to transfer these to the Panama steamer which touches at Mazatlan but not at Guaymas. This I have refused. Since June last two hundred and fifty-six Chinese have been sent in transit to Guaymas and one hundred and thirty-six to Mazatlan. Eighty-six of these it is known have stopped at Ensenada, and I have information that others are entering the United States at Nogales. I regard my action as important in execution exclusion act. Please telegraph approval.

In apparently the first of the series of communications constituting Document 97, Secretary Windom, on April 12, 1890, says:

The alleged violations appear to consist mainly in the use of fraudulent certificates, in smuggling across the northern and southern frontiers of Chinese laborers, and in the existence of a general system among Chinese residents in this country and Canada for the fraudulent landing of Chinese laborers within the territory of the United States.

Part 2 of the document contains a letter from Collector Berry, of San Diego, to the Secretary of the Treasury, dated April 7, 1890, saying:

Thirteen Chinamen, part of list of over eighty transferred in San Francisco Harbor, March 25 from City of Pekin to Newbern and by Newbern landed at Ensenada, Lower California, March 27, were captured at Mexican line yesterday before daylight; balance of list no doubt on way here to cross line in same way. Necessary to guard both harbor entrance and about 20 miles boundary line from coast inward. Additional temporary officers absolutely necessary. Can they be appointed? No deputy marshal here, and local constabulary will not assist, because no pay in it. Vigorous action would probably break up this mode of smuggling.

The Committee on Immigration of the Senate, and the Select Committee on Immigration and Naturalization of the House of the Fifty-first Congress were directed to make an investigation into the operation of the immigration laws, and a subcommittee consisting of one Senator and two Representatives visited the Pacific coast. The Senator who acted as chairman was the Senator from Washington [Mr. SQUIRE], and the testimony which was taken is printed as House Report 4048, Fifty-first Congress, second session, on Chinese immigration made by Mr. Lehlbach. There is abundant evidence to be found in this report showing the constant inroad of Chinese into the United States from British Columbia. I will detain the Senate by reading from the statements of one or two witnesses. On page 20 is to be found the testimony of Mr. Fred. H. Oliver, who is one of our inspectors on the border. He is asked this question:

Q. Do you believe many Chinese have come over the border in violation of the law other than those you speak of?

A. I have reason to believe that quite a number have come across the eastern Cascade Mountains.

Q. Can you form any estimate of what number?

A. Something like three or four hundred for the last year.

He is also asked:

Q. Do you know anything about the number of Chinese there are in British Columbia?

A. I think Victoria is about the best place to find out how many Chinese come across the border to any point we have. For this reason, every Chinese man who goes there pays a tax of $50 a head. He is registered, and each year he remains there he pays the government of British Columbia a certain amount of money, something like $8 or $10. They keep track of them in that way. Now, I think up to the end of the fiscal year in June, I saw the report and I think there were either 5,000 or 7,000 Chinese that had landed in that year, and there were only 2,000 remained there of the 7,000 that had landed. Seven thousand landed, and out of that number 5,000 left, or else 5,000 landed and it was 3,000 that had left, I am not sure whether it was 5,000 or 7,000 that landed.

Mr. Charles B. Wood, a special deputy collector at Port Townsend, Puget Sound, gives the following testimony:

Q. How many Chinese do you think have come in from British Columbia to the United States unlawfully during the time you have been in the Government service, say since April, 1889?

A. On an average about fifty a week.

Q. That is an average?

A. Yes, sir. They have not all come into the Puget Sound country, but they have come into the United States from British Columbia. They go east over the Canadian Pacific and go down into North Dakota. There are lots of them there.

Q. That would be about 2,600 per annum?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Now what means have you at arriving at these figures?

A. Simply from the list of Chinese persons that come on the steamers running between Vancouver and China and the number that remain in British Columbia.

Q. Do you think a detective stationed at Victoria on the British Columbia side would be of any use, or have you such an officer over there?

A. No, sir; we have no official there now.

Q. Do you know anything about the number of Chinese in Victoria?

A. I presume there are between 3,000 and 5,000 Chinese in Victoria.

Q. And then, as I understand you, you arrive at this by keeping track of the number of arrivals from China?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. By vessels coming into Victoria and Vancouver, in British Columbia, and then trying to account for their absence?

A. Yes, sir. There are those things to be considered. We are on very friendly terms with a special agent they had there and with the collector at Victoria. When a Chinaman leaves there he takes a certificate in order that he may come back; that is, if he has paid his $50 head tax, he takes his certificate so that he can go back without paying the tax again, and we have had information from there of 125 leaving in one month. In that way then there were quite a number of others that came in that did not pay this tax but slipped away from the vessel and came over to this side of the line.

Q. How many do you think have come in on this side of the Cascade Range?

A. In that length of time?

Q. Yes, sir. How many of that number?

A. Probably 800 or 1,000.

Q. Then you have more of them come in on the other side of the mountain?

A. Yes, sir; on the other side and east.

Q. I mean more particularly this collection district.

A. I don't think there are that number that come into this collection district.

Q. How many would you say would come into this collection district?

A. Probably 1,200 or 1,500 per annum.

Q. And of that number 800 or 1,000 come in on the waters of Puget Sound?

A. Yes, sir.

Mr. Charles M. Bradshaw, of Port Townsend, collector for the district of Puget Sound, being asked to make a statement as to the enforcement of the Chinese exclusion act, says:

The difficulty in enforcing it on this northern border is that the Chinese have a landing place in British Columbia. They come there and by paying $50 to the British Columbian Government get into that country. We subsequently get the Chinamen. At Victoria particularly it is quite a business in importing Chinamen; they desire to get rid of them themselves and many men make good wages by assisting them across the boundary line here. They come over mostly in small boats. They go first, however, on board a steamship, coming from Hongkong to Victoria or Vancouver, British Columbia. From there they go to Victoria and make their start, with few exceptions.

Some go further on towards Montreal and cross the boundary at Detroit, and along on that border and reach Eastern cities. That I only know, however, from such information as I can get from the Chinese themselves who are engaged in importing, and who do not deny their complicity. These steamers bring out from 60 to 120, one steamer every three weeks. I think probably we get here, on this side, two-thirds of these men. British Columbia retains some of them, and their Chinese population is increasing much faster than ours is, proportionately.

Q. You mean that particular locality at Victoria?

A. Or Vancouver Island more particularly; they reach the north end of the island.

Q. How many do you think come over here per month?
A. That would be very hard to tell. I do not think, however, it exceeds 50 or 60. Some of them we catch and return them to Victoria, and they make another start. One Chinaman that can be readily identified has been taken back to Victoria five different times.

Mr. D. B. Hannah, a business man at Tacoma, says:

I don't suppose, if the truth was known, that there is one Chinaman in five in Washington Territory to-day who did not come in against the laws of the United States. I don't hardly think there is one in ten. During the years before they were excluded from this town I want to tell you a little experience I had in this matter. Down at the Tacoma Mills there was a Chinese structure built in the hollow there, and there was one built down here just south of the wharf at the steamboat landing. The Chinese constructed an innumerable number of houses and shanties, some two, and some one-story, and I think one or two three-story houses. One day there would be fifty Chinamen in the houses down there at that mill; the next day there would be three hundred. These Chinamen were brought from Victoria in schooners and rushed into this place down here below Old Town, as it is called, and there they were landed and conducted by parties living in Old Town into these shanties and placed in those houses, from fifty to two hundred in a night, and the same way on this wharf.

Having given these statements from the testimony, I read from the report submitted by Representative Lehlbach representing the subcommittee:

In this connection your committee will state that the fact that some Chinese manage to surreptitiously come into the United States from British Columbia across the boundary seems to be established by the testimony; but this number does not exceed three hundred annually.

There is a head or landing tax of $50 charged by the Columbian authorities, and no Chinaman can land at Victoria who has not paid it. That, together with the vigilance of our own customs officers, is sufficient, in the judgment of your committee, to prevent any increase in this supposed number.

The Chinaman is very shrewd and cunning and will resort to all practices in order to obtain admission to the country. The Chinese have employed counsel in San Francisco, whose duty it is to sue out writs of habeas corpus for all Chinese arriving in this country at that port who are denied a landing by the collector. The petitioners for the writ are allowed to give security for their appearance in court. They give their own countrymen as security, who willingly swear that they are worth double the amount of recognizance, although the officer taking the bail knows from past experience that such bail piece is utterly worthless, and that in these cases of habeas corpus large fees and costs accumulate, which have to be paid, and a very small percentage of Chinamen so landed are ever deported to China.

It appears that the number of these cases amounted to 7,000 in the year 1888, and since then to 1,992. A very large number of the cases remain untied on the court dockets. Of the cases disposed of above 67 per cent are ordered to be remanded and deported, and of this number so remanded less than 5 per cent are ever found and deported. Very few suits have been instituted upon the forfeited bail piece, as the United States district attorney informed the subcommittee that such suits would only result in further cost to the Government, as no property belonging to the bondsmen could ever be found to satisfy judgment. Another fact elicited is that the counsel generally employed in these cases are also attorneys of the Chinese consul and of the Six Companies. This has been a fruitful source of increasing the Chinese population, and your committee would suggest that in these cases no Chinaman be allowed to become security for the appearance of a petitioner unless he shall deposit, either in money or interest-bearing securities, in bank, to the credit of the case, the amount of such recognizance.

The subcommittee also ascertained that quite a number of Chinamen came into this country from Mexico. This subject was also carefully investigated at San Francisco and also at Los Angeles and San Diego.

In the last report of the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Foster, dated December 7, 1891, the Secretary, referring to his construction of the laws that all Chinese unlawfully coming should be sent back to China, says:

The Department therefore ordered all such persons returned to China, regardless of the avenue of their entrance into this country, with such success that Chinese immigration was practically broken upon the Mexican frontier and measurably checked on the Canadian frontier. But within the last few months the instructions of the Department for deportation to China have been stayed in some instances by the action of the courts in returning such persons to Canada as the country from whence they came, and while the Department has not relaxed its efforts to enforce the law, it has been unable, as a result of such judicial action, to withstand the great influx of Chinese laborers along our Canadian border. It is undoubtedly true that the Chinese population of the United States has been considerably increased within the past year by the addition of Chinese laborers who have entered by way of Canada. Syndicates have been formed and much capital has been invested to further this unlawful immigration.

Mr. President, I have felt that it was important to detain the Senate sufficiently to place upon record some of the recent evidence showing why we need more stringent laws in order to prevent an influx of Chinamen over the Canadian border. The Senate will notice that the Dominion of Canada imposes a tax of $50 per head upon every Chinaman coming into British Columbia, and that while the Government of Canada gets the $50 we as a general rule get the Chinaman. I saw a newspaper report concerning the late Sir John Macdonald, the prime minister of Canada, shortly before his death, saying that when he was waited upon by a delegation of Canadians to complain concerning the introduction of Chinese into the Dominion of Canada he said that they ought not to feel disturbed, for "we get $50 for every one who comes in and he immediately goes over into the United States." I do not know whether Sir John Macdonald said this or not, but at any rate the facts were substantially as he is reported to have stated them; and it is necessary that a very stringent law should be enacted to meet the cases of Chinese migration across the border.

It may be thought a harsh proceeding to imprison Chinamen coming here unlawfully and after their terms of imprisonment to send them to China. The necessity, however, is a very evident one. Unless the Chinamen coming unlawfully into the country are placed in prison, the penalty of a return to China or across the border is of no value whatever. The Chinaman can move easily; he gets transportation at the expense of the United States about the time that he is ready to go across the border or is ready to go to China again. When he wishes to return to this country once more there is no difficulty in his coming here, and therefore practically, as has been shown by the testimony which I have read and as will appear from much other testimony that is accessible, there is no way of keeping Chinese out of this country except by imposing a term of imprisonment upon them. Put them in prison for a limited period of time and deport them after they have served the term of imprisonment, and this penalty will be effective, and no other will be effective. Therefore I am desirous that the Senate shall adopt section 7 of the House bill.

We have been told by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] that we ought not to undertake to amend the House bill, but ought to adopt the Senate committee substitute, because the House bill is in violation of the treaty with China. I do not discover in the facts, as I have investigated them, any reason why we should withhold our consideration from the House bill because of anything that is contained in the Chinese treaty of 1880. If that treaty stood to-day intact, if it had never been violated by us, or if the conduct of China herself had been such as to satisfy the United States, I might think that it would not be best to pass this measure until efforts had been made to negotiate a new treaty with China; but Senators can not be unmindful of the exact situation, which is that this treaty has been already violated by the act of 1888. A new treaty had been negotiated by Mr. Bayard. It had been sent to the Senate, and had been agreed to by the Senate on the 7th of May, 1888, with two amendments to article 1 and article 7. Toward the close of article 1 the coming of Chinese laborers was prohibited for twenty years, and the Senate added this clause:

And this prohibition shall extend to the return of Chinese laborers who are not now in the United States, whether holding return certificates under existing laws or not.

And to article 7 there was added:

And no such Chinese laborer shall be permitted to enter the United States by land or sea without producing to the proper officer of the customs the return certificate herein required.

Those amendments were submitted to the Chinese Government and they were not agreed to by that Government.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator is speaking now of the amendments proposed by the Senate to the treaty of 1888?

Mr. CHANDLER. I am speaking of the Senate amendments to the treaty of 1888.

Mr. MITCHELL. How many were there; two?

Mr. CHANDLER. There were two amendments.

Mr. MITCHELL. I wish the Senator would read them again.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have once read them, and I will send the treaty to the Senator from Oregon, so that he can see just what they are. I have two copies.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have been trying to get a copy.

Mr. CHANDLER. Now, the Chinese Government having refused to consent to these two Senate amendments to the treaty, what was called the Scott bill was introduced in the House of Representatives, passed that body and came to the Senate, and on the 6th of September, 1888, on a vote in the Senate, there were 37 yeas and no nays, there being no quorum. On the 7th of September the vote was again taken, and there were 37 yeas and 3 nays, of Senator Brown of Georgia, Senator HOAR of Massachusetts, and Senator WILSON of Iowa, and the bill was passed by the Senate. It was approved by the President, and there has been upon the statute book ever since this law known as the Scott law.

It distinctly appeared in that debate that this law was a violation of the treaty. That fact was developed with a great deal of distinctness by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER], and he secured an admission to that effect from both the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN]. I read from the proceedings of September 3, 1888, in volume 19 of the RECORD, part 9, Fiftieth Congress, first session, as follows:

Mr. BUTLER. I simply rose for the purpose of asking the Senator from Ohio, as a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, whether if this measure should become a law it would not be in direct conflict with an existing treaty between this Government and the Chinese Government?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it is inconsistent with the treaty, but as the Chinese Government have declined to make a change in the treaty, we have an unquestioned right to pass this proposed law.

Mr. BUTLER. But the point I want to make is whether there is a treaty now existing between the United States and the Chinese Empire with which this bill would come in conflict if it should become a law?

Mr. SHERMAN. Undoubtedly.

Next the Senator from South Carolina said:

I have been opposed, and I am now, to the introduction of Chinese into this country. I have always been opposed to it, and I will go as far as the Senator from Colorado or any other Senator in excluding them from this country; but I do like to see a little bit of consistency in gentlemen charged with the consideration of such grave matters as are presented to us in this whole question of Chinese immigration. I shall vote for the bill. I am very sorry, however, to be informed by the Senator from Ohio that it is a violation of a treaty.

Mr. TELLER. It is no violation of a treaty.

Mr. BUTLER. Well, that it is an abrogation of a treaty. I am very sorry to do that. I do not believe that the Senate would for one instant consider a proposition of this kind if it related to a strong, vigorous, active power in friendly relations with us.

The Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL], on page 8218, said: Of course the bill, as all must concede, is in direct contravention of the provisions of the second article of our existing treaty with China.

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] made the same statement.

The Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] said on September 6, 1890, page 8339:

I desire, however, to ask him whether in his judgment or opinion as a lawyer this pending bill does abrogate and repeal material provisions of our existing treaty with China?

Mr. MORGAN. I have not any more doubt of it than that I have the honor of speaking from this desk.

Mr. MITCHELL. Nor I.

Mr. MORGAN. Nobody that I have ever heard of denies it. It is a repeal by repugnant or oppugnant legislation.

Mr. MITCHELL. No doubt of it.

Mr. MORGAN. I should have been better satisfied if the House had come out and stated "article so and so is hereby repealed." Nevertheless, lawyers will not disagree as to what the effect of this is to be.

So we have the distinctly admitted fact, the fact unquestioned either then or now, that the Scott law of October 1, 1888, was a violation of the treaty with China.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire that the term "violation" does not apply. It is an abrogation.

Mr. MITCHELL. A repeal.

Mr. TELLER. A repeal. A violation is when some act is performed while the treaty remains in existence. It is not considered when a nation repudiates in a proper way a treaty that it violates it. It abrogates it.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask the Senator whether he considers the treaty now in force?

Mr. TELLER. So far as the legislation is contrary to the terms of the treaty the latter is pro tanto repealed, or abrogated, if you choose that term, not violated.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not now fully understand the point of the Senator. Of course this is not a mere question of language. As the Senator from South Carolina showed in the debate of 1888, it makes no difference, whether you use the word abrogation or violation. The same colloquy took place then that is now going on as to which word should be used.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator allow me to state why there is a wide distinction between the abrogation of a treaty and the violation of a treaty?

Mr. CHANDLER. I am willing to have the Senator state what the difference is in the situation now, whether one word or the other is used.

Mr. TELLER. I understand that when we enter into a treaty with China or any other nation the Government of the United States retains for itself, as every other nation in the world does, the right at any time to abrogate that treaty or any portion of it. It covenants with the power that it makes the treaty with that it will not violate the treaty, and if it violates the treaty then the other power has a right to complain, but it has no right to complain of an abrogation. So there is a wide distinction between the violation of a treaty and its abrogation. For instance, if we had a treaty with China by which the Chinese people could come here, and if our officials had, without law, prohibited the landing of those persons, leaving the treaty intact, that would have been a violation of the treaty, and China would rightfully complain of that; but after we had passed a law which justified our officials in their exclusion China had no right to complain because she took the treaty with us subject to the provision of general law that we might retire from it whenever we saw fit without her concurrence.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not exactly understand the difference; but I perceive the Senator from South Carolina does understand it, and I hope that when he comes to speak on this subject he will elucidate that point a little more clearly for the benefit of the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. BUTLER. I was just waiting with some anxiety to see how the Senator from New Hampshire was going to get out of the dilemma in which I found myself in the former debate. I do not think he has got out of it any better than I did.

Mr. CHANDLER. I think it is a distinction without a difference.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator allow me a word?

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not understand now what the point is of the Senator from Colorado, but I have no doubt the Senator from Oregon will make it entirely plain.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator from Oregon will make it entirely clear.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think the Senator from Colorado made it entirely plain. I think it is not a distinction without a difference. I think the difference is marked and well defined. For instance, we make a treaty with a foreign government—with China, if you please—and before Congress in its sovereign capacity undertakes to repeal or abrogate the treaty the executive department of the Government does some act in direct contravention of the terms of the treaty. That would be a violation of the treaty, because the treaty still remains in existence; but if the sovereign power acting through Congress, as it rightfully may, repeals the treaty or abrogates the treaty, that is not a violation of the treaty, but an abrogation or a repeal of the treaty.

Mr. CHANDLER. In that sense of course Congress never could violate a treaty; it would only abrogate it.

Mr. TELLER. That is all.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Executive fails to conform to the treaty that would be a violation of it; but after all my point is that a portion of this treaty has been destroyed, and is not now in existence. I ask the Senator from Colorado whether he considers the rest of it in existence or not?

Mr. TELLER. There is no question but that we might repeal one section, and then the country with which we treated might if they saw fit repeal the rest of it. They could repeal the whole thing and say, "if we can not have that section we will not have any."

Mr. CHANDLER. As I understand the case the treaty remains in force until it is abrogated by a new treaty or an act of Congress.

Mr. TELLER. By one action or the other.

Mr. BUTLER. We must be careful in the words we use.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. CHANDLER. Yes, sir; I desire a contribution from the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. DAWES. Then when we enter into a treaty with a nation, no matter what its terms are, it means we are bound to keep it only so long as we have a mind to.

Mr. CHANDLER. That I understand to be the position of the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. DAWES. Is that the position of the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. CHANDLER. I have not yet defined my view on that subject. I was about to define my position when the Senator from Colorado made his old point of 1888, that there is a difference between an abrogation and a violation. I am getting light on the subject, and if all Senators will contribute to inform me I have no doubt I shall understand it before I get through.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator from Massachusetts refers to this as a new doctrine. The Senator will find it laid down in Puffendorf, he will find it laid down in Vattel, that this is the law, and it has been declared in the Senate for many years.

Mr. DAWES. I find this laid down in Puffendorf and Vattel, that every nation has the power—

Mr. TELLER. That is what I am talking about.

Mr. DAWES. To break its treaty, just as every individual may have the power to break his contract; but it takes the consequences. If the nation with whom it has made the treaty has the power to redress the wrong it may. Every nation can abrogate by law a treaty. A declaration of war is the abrogation of all treaties with the nation with whom we may make war, but we take the consequences. We make a treaty with China, we bind ourselves that it shall be inviolate for ten years, and that when ten years are at an end we are to give six months' notice. Now, I understand the Senator from Colorado to say we have a perfect right at the end of five years to cut it in two. That means, as I said before, that when we make a treaty we agree that we will be bound by it just as long as we have a mind to be.

Mr. TELLER. That is perhaps what it amounts to. I will not subscribe to the doctrine the Senator has just declared, that a declaration of war avoids all treaties, for I think the modern authorities are that it does not avoid all treaties. It may suspend treaties for the time being, but it does not avoid them.

Mr. CHANDLER. Now, I ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether he thinks it makes any material difference in the discussion of this subject whether we use the word "abrogate," or "violate"?

Mr. DAWES. Not the slightest, according to my idea. There are very many ways of breaking a treaty in two. One is by an act of Congress, and one is by the act of the Executive; or the individual may violate it.

Mr. CHANDLER. Then the Senator from Massachusetts and

I am in accord on that subject. He asks me what my opinion is. My opinion is that we have already violated or abrogated this treaty by act of Congress.

Mr. PLATT. Does the Senator mean entirely or partially?

Mr. CHANDLER. Philologically we have done it, certainly. To what extent we have abrogated it or violated it is a question for discussion. My argument is, in order to overcome the objection of the Senator from Ohio that we must not amend the House bill but must take the Senate bill which the Committee on Foreign Relations recommend to us, that having violated this treaty or abrogated this treaty in part or in whole, it will be no great further offense to amend the House bill instead of taking the Senate substitute.

Mr. DAWES. Then let me inquire, does the Senator mean to say that since we have violated it once we may twice?

Mr. CHANDLER. I think that that is a very fair argument for the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. BUTLER. I will say to the Senator that that was the argument made by me to the Senator from Oregon yesterday.

Mr. CHANDLER. To anticipate a little, I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts that there is no other proposition before the Senate except to violate it.

Mr. DAWES. To violate it again?

Mr. CHANDLER. Yes, to violate it again.

Mr. DAWES. And the justification is that we have violated it once before?

Mr. CHANDLER. Yes, and there is nobody here who proposes not to violate it again. It is violated by the House bill and it is violated by the Senate substitute, or abrogated, whichever Senators choose to call it.

Mr. HISCOCK. May I make a suggestion to the Senator?

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly; I am getting a great deal of enlightenment.

Mr. HISCOCK. Suppose we violated the treaty once, which I grant, then doubtless China had the power to abrogate the treaty, to declare it off? China did not do that, but continued it in force for eight or ten years after that, all of the other provisions remaining. Now, is not that practically a consent to the treaty with the amendment that has since been made to it by the United States?

Mr. CHANDLER. There is a very good answer to that, which the Senator will see when I get a little further along. China has not assented to the abrogation. She has refused to receive a new minister from the United States because we passed the law of 1888. She says she will not take him; that she hopes the Secretary of State will get that law repealed, and that if we will repeal that law she will receive the minister, much as she disliked his utterances.

Mr. PLATT. The Scott law?

Mr. CHANDLER. The Scott law. The Senator from New York will hardly pretend under those circumstances that China has acquiesced in our abrogation of the treaty; and if the Senator will wait until after I get through with this point I will call his attention more particularly to the position of China on that subject.

But before the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] leaves the Chamber I want to say, as he has asked me whether I think we have done right or not, that I have looked to see what his record and mine were on the original abrogation. I find that neither of us voted, but I find that my colleague, Mr. Blair, said:

If my colleague [Mr. CHANDLER] were here he would vote "yea." He is unavoidably detained from the Senate for a few days.

I will not disown my colleague's statement. I will put myself in the condition of the Senator from South Carolina, and say that I presume I should have voted for that bill if I had been here, and I might have been ashamed of it ever after, as he says he has been and is.

Mr. BUTLER. I am delighted to have the Senator from New Hampshire agree with me.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] is not recorded as having voted, and therefore we have no authentic ascertainment of his views, and do not know whether he would have been willing to participate in this violation of the treaty.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator from Massachusetts was unfortunately going between the room of the Committee on Appropriations and this Chamber about half the time during the discussion of this and other matters about that time, and was unable to devote much time to this subject. I see that the Senator from New Hampshire is familiar with that interesting volume which he has before him. He will find in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a speech which I made upon this question, in which I made known to my constituents and to those to whom my opinions were of the slightest consequence that I utterly opposed that whole legislation, and tried to show its immoral character and its wickedness.

Mr. CHANDLER. Then I have no doubt that if the Senator had been present and voted there would have been four votes against the bill instead of three.

Mr. DAWES. He would certainly have voted against it if he had been here.

Mr. PLATT. I know how disagreeable interruptions are, but I will ask the Senator from New Hampshire if he will not permit me to make a statement as to the extent to which the law passed in 1888 was repugnant to the treaty, as I understand it. By the treaty of 1880 we did provide that Chinese laborers who were then in the United States should be allowed to come and go of their own free will and accord. That was in 1880, and had reference solely to those Chinese laborers who were then in the country. By the law of 1888 we did provide—

That from and after the passage of this act, it shall be unlawful for any Chinese laborer who shall at any time heretofore have been, or who may now or hereafter be, a resident within the United States, and who shall have departed, or shall depart therefrom, and shall not have returned before the passage of this act, to return to, or remain in, the United States.

So as to those Chinese laborers who were in the United States in 1880 when the treaty was adopted and who had left it and were absent at the time of the passage of the law in 1888, or who left it thereafter, I think the law was repugnant to the treaty; this is its extent and no more. The treaty did not apply to Chinese laborers who had come after 1880. There was no exemption for them in the treaty, but as to those Chinese laborers who were in the United States in 1880 the law undoubtedly was repugnant to the treaty.

Mr. CHANDLER. The offense was a small one undoubtedly. The fact now stated by the Senator from Connecticut was clearly and felicitously shown by the Senator from Oregon in the debate on the law of 1888. The precise effect of that law upon the treaty and the extent to which the law violated the treaty very clearly appear from the Senator's speech at that time.

But, Mr. President, the point is this, that we did pass a bill in admitted violation or abrogation of a portion of the treaty, and it became the law of October 1, 1888. We had passed on September 13, 1888, on the assumption that China would consent to the Senate amendments to the treaty, a long statute, which stands upon the records of the two Houses as an obsolete law, because China did not consent to the amendments of the treaty, and the treaty never came into existence. Therefore we passed the law of October 1, 1888, which was in violation of the treaty, and now the point I make is that it is proposed by the Senate committee that this very law of October 1 we shall continue for ten years longer. Therefore the whole argument against the adoption of the House bill because it is in violation of the treaty or in abrogation of the treaty falls to the ground. It is just as legitimate and appropriate for us to violate the treaty in other particulars as it is to do it by the reenactment of the law of October 1, 1888.

Mr. President, I do not think that the Chinese Government is in a condition to expect from us that we shall refrain from passing such laws on the subject of Chinese immigration as it seems good to Congress to pass. The attitude of the Chinese Government is very clearly stated in the correspondence which is before the Senate and has been made public in reference to the rejection of my late colleague, Senator Blair, as minister to China.

Mr. PLATT. What is the number of the document?

Mr. CHANDLER. It is Executive Document E, of the Fifty-second Congress, first session. I approach this point with some feelings of trepidation, because I am painfully conscious of the fact that every Senator who votes for this House bill is thereby forever disqualified from being a minister to China.

We all enter upon this debate and upon this vote under this ban, that if we vote for a law which the Chinese Government does not like we shall none of us ever have the opportunity of being received by the Chinese Government as minister to the Celestial Empire. It is a disability which may rest heavily upon some Senators. I can think now of only two Senators who are not likely to be under that ban. One is the Senator from Ohio, who has already been mentioned in the dispatches of the Chinese Government as a Senator whose course in this body meets with the approval of that empire, and should the Senator after thirty-six years—

Mr. SHERMAN. I will give the Senator my chance.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am now making myself ineligible. Should the Senator, after his thirty-six years in the Senate, wish to visit a foreign country as the representative of some Republican Administration, as the venerable Senator from Maine [Mr. Hamlin] desired to do—and was sent to Madrid—the Senator will be received in China; and I judge that if there should be a Democratic Administration, the Senator from South Carolina, on account of his frank acknowledgment that he has made in the Senate to-day, might also be received there. But I can think of no other Senators who will not be likely to be disqualified from being ministers to China when I consider the position of the Chinese Government with reference to my late colleague, Mr. Blair. I read from this executive document what took place at the State Department on June 23, 1891:

The minister says to the honorable Mr. Wharton that he sent right away by cable to the Tsung-li Yamén the message which Mr. Wharton asked, that the Government of the United States thought that the Chinese Government had made a mistake as to Mr. Blair's record and that it hoped a reconsideration of its action might be taken.

The minister has received a cablegram from the Viceroy Li Hung Chang, communicating the answer of the Tsung-li Yamén, and he is directed to say that Mr. Blair is not popularly regarded in China. It is possible some of the reports sent there may not be all correct, but the Chinese Government understands that he voted for the exclusion law of 1888, when he was a Senator, and it has received copies of his speeches in which he compared the Chinese in the United States to "yellow fever" and to "pestilential diseases," and said the Government had the same right to keep the Chinese out of its territory as these diseases.

It is informed that he did favor putting off the law for two months to know what had become of the treaty, but at the same time he praised the law and said "it accomplishes an untold good," and he declared that he was in favor of sending out of the country the Chinese laborers now in it, which he called "this great continental nuisance," which "ought to be abated by State and national laws." And these speeches were made after speeches had been made by Mr. SHERMAN, the chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, and by Mr. EVARTS, once Secretary of State, which are quoted in the note of his predecessor to Mr. Blair of July 8, 1889, in which the first said that if Great Britain passed such a law against the United States he would be in favor of war—

That is the Senator from Ohio. The Chinese Government understands that the Senator from Ohio in the Senate said: "If Great Britain passed such a law against the United States he would be in favor of war"— and the latter said it was the first time the United States had done such an insulting thing.

Now, I come to the important part of this communication. I read on page 9:

The minister says that the passing of that law while the treaty was being considered has had a very bad effect in China. If the President or the Secretary of State could do anything to repeal that law and to put in force again the treaties—

If the Senator from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] were here I would call his attention to that language—and to put in force again the treaties, the situation in China would be much changed; and then it would not make much difference what Mr. Blair has said and he would be well received if the President asked for it. But Mr. Wharton must know that the last Chinese minister had written to Mr. Bayard and afterwards to Mr. Blaine long notes, and that he had also written Mr. Blaine notes complaining of the passing of that law, showing by great American public men that it was against the treaties and in violation of all the conduct of the United States to all other governments, and that its passage had done great harm and loss to many thousands of poor Chinese; and Mr. Wharton must know that the United States Government has not made any answer to these complaints.

The minister, therefore, lays the question before Mr. Wharton and asks him to lay it before the President, whether before any satisfaction is given to China or any answer is made to those notes, it is reasonable to ask that Government to receive as minister one of the men who voted for that law and who has made such speeches against the Chinese as the ones which have been seen by the Tsung-li Yamén. The Chinese Government has always been anxious to preserve the very best and friendliest relations with the United States, and has always tried to treat its ministers with the greatest consideration and confidence, and it will be very sorry if its conduct in this matter is not agreeable to the President; but the viceroy believes the President can understand the situation in China, and will see that it was not possible to take any other course.

There is the position of China to-day. China declares that the treaty has been violated. China declares that the treaties are not in force. China rejects a minister on account of something which he is supposed to have said in the Senate of the United States, and then deliberately announces that if the President and the Secretary of State will repeal the Scott law and again put in force the treaty, no matter what Mr. Blair has said he will be well received, if the President desires it.

I submit that under these circumstances there is no condition of treaty negotiation and no condition of amicable relation between the United States and China which calls upon us to hesitate in the slightest degree to put upon our statute book such legislation as we think ought to be enacted in the interest and for the welfare of the people of the United States.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly.

Mr. DAWES. Does the Senator call to mind the many times that we have complained of Great Britain for violating the treaty of 1818 on our eastern coast, and insisted upon it that she should observe the treaty? Does it follow that because we admit that she has violated it that we have given it up; that because Great Britain has violated it in repeated instances therefore she is at liberty to violate it just as much as she pleases, and that because we complain that she has violated it therefore we admit that the treaty is no longer in force?

Mr. CHANDLER. In the case which the Senator cites I suppose Great Britain never admitted that she had violated the treaty. In this case the Chinese Government says we violated the treaty, and we admit that we violated the treaty. The Chinese Government says that she will not receive a United States minister duly appointed by the President with the consent of the Senate, on account of words spoken in debate upon this floor, but that she will receive him if we will repeal the law.

The Senator asks me if that destroys the treaty. I say no, it does not destroy the treaty, but it shows such a condition of intercourse between this Government and China as justifies us in putting upon the statute book concerning Chinese immigration any law that the interests of our people require.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator will certainly not hold to that proposition when he reflects that the fourth section of that treaty provides the manner in which it shall be repealed or abrogated. The treaty itself provides for it, as almost all treaties with foreign powers do.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am free to admit that I think the situation between the Chinese Government and the United States is a bad one. It is unfortunate in two particulars. It is unfortunate in this, that whereas we negotiated a treaty in 1888, which was amended by the Senate and the amendments were not accepted by China, and we thereupon proceeded to pass a law which was in partial abrogation of the treaty, there has been so far as we can learn, no negotiation whatever upon this delicate subject with the Chinese Government from 1888 down to this hour.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator allow me right there to make a suggestion in answer to the one made by the Senator from Massachusetts a moment ago as to something Great Britain had done in reference to our treaties? I wish to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that Great Britain in 1870 passed an act abrogating in large part the extradition treaty of 1842, which we had with that Government.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not understand that it is any very unusual course for a country to pass a law in derogation or in partial abrogation or in violation—I am a little confused in these terms—of a treaty. I do not understand that it is unusual.

Mr. DAWES. I want to get right with my friend from Oregon. I admit that they had the power to break the treaty. It is a question of power and not of right. We have the power to say we will no longer be bound by our agreement, but it is not a right.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is true; we not only have the power but all the law writers on the subject go a step further and say that whenever any treaty between two nations becomes pernicious in its effect and its operations towards the institutions of one of them, then it is not only the right but the duty of the sovereign power to abrogate it.

Mr. DAWES. I say so, too.

Mr. CHANDLER. Now, I say the situation is unfortunate. It seems to me, with all due deference to those who know more about this subject than I do, that when the new treaty had failed and the amendments to it had been refused by China and a law had been passed partially abrogating the treaty, that negotiations should have been resumed. But four years have passed and no such negotiations have taken place, and now the only position of the Chinese Government on this subject is expressed in this correspondence in connection with the rejection of Mr. Blair, which, as I have already suggested, seems to me a matter of serious importance.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator says that we negotiated with China, in the first instance, before we passed the Scott law, but that that treaty was not accepted by China. Does it not amount to this: We tried to get a treaty with China that would permit us to pass the Scott law and failed. Then we passed the Scott law without the consent of China. That is to say, we cut the treaty by a statute, which we had the power to do. The Senator's argument is that having done that we have done a great deal bigger wrong than this one, which is a little one, and that it is not so bad as the other.

Mr. CHANDLER. The case is not quite correctly stated by the Senator. If a law was before the Senate in favor of abrogating the law of 1888 and restoring the treaty, then the Senator's argument would be pertinent, but nobody proposes that. The law of 1888 expires with the law of 1882 on the 6th of the coming May, and it is now proposed that we shall renew that violation of the treaty. I say that if we can do that at the instigation and upon the recommendation of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, we can also go further in our legislation by the adoption, after amending it as we choose, of the bill on the subject which has passed the House of Representatives.

Mr. DAWES. Suppose a burglar should stand up in court in answer to an indictment and say, "four years ago I stole out of this very house twice as much as you have accused me of here now; you have never done anything about that for four years, and I set that up as a justification for the present robbery."

Mr. CHANDLER. I wish the Senator from Massachusetts had been here when the law of 1888 was passed. With his eloquent voice joined to that of his colleague, who was here and cast his vote against it, perhaps that law might have been stayed. But I confront the Senator from Massachusetts with the fact that that law did pass almost unanimously, and that the case now before the Senate is whether we shall confine ourselves to simply renewing that violation of the treaty or whether we shall go a little further and cover the whole subject of Chinese immigration in accordance with the interests of the American people.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator allow me just there to remark that the only member of this body who made a vigorous and determined effort to stay the passage of the Scott exclusion act is the man whom the Chinese Government rejects as minister to that country.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am very thankful to the Senator from Oregon for recalling me to my text, and I hope now I may be allowed to proceed without interruption. It is entirely true, as shown by the papers before the Senate, that my colleague, Senator Blair, was almost the only Senator who made a vigorous fight to stay the effect of the Scott law until China could act upon the amendments of the treaty. So we have this case in reference to China, that in order to force a repeal of the Scott law she has selected the one man of all others whom she should not have selected, and rejected him as minister to China in order to dictate to the United States that the Congress must repeal the Scott law.

Mr. President, there have been no negotiations in reference to this treaty or the subject-matter of the treaty which it seems was violated in 1888 by the Government, and so far as appears there has been little if any communication by the Administration with the Chinese Government in relation to the rejection of Senator Blair on the ground that he had made speeches in the Senate which were not acceptable to the Chinese Government, although that Government offered, if the law could be repealed, to receive him if the President desired it. In Senator Blair's letter of June 22, 1891, to Mr. Wharton, he says:

In 1882, Senate bill 71, a proposed exclusion act, passed both Houses of Congress and was vetoed by President Arthur.

I opposed and voted against the bill on its passage, and also sustained and voted for the veto by which the bill was defeated, although the bill was supported by a majority of the Senate.

House bill No. 5804 was passed in the same Congress by which the treaty of 1890 was carried into effect by the suspension of the immigration of Chinese laborers until the year 1892. The President approved the bill and it became a law, and this is the "exclusion act." I opposed and voted against it.

I did not speak at all upon either bill, nor upon the subject-matter.

Passing from 1882 to 1888, it appears that the Scott bill was adopted by a vote of 37 to 3, and Senator Blair voted for it, as he had voted for it on the previous day.

Having voted for the bill, I had the right to move to reconsider, and immediately did so, saying that my purpose was to move the amendment which I sent to the desk, which was read, and is as follows:

"Add a new section:

"SEC. 5. This act shall not take effect until the expiration of sixty days after its passage, unless the pending treaty between China and the United States be rejected by China within that time, but shall take effect immediately upon such rejection; and this act shall take effect upon the expiration of sixty days after its passage, provided that said treaty shall not within that time have been ratified. If within sixty days from the passage of this act said treaty shall have been ratified by China, then this act shall be void."

On the 13th day of September I modified the amendment so as to substitute "November 1" for "sixty days," and providing that—

"The President shall at once make known the passage of this act, by the most expeditious method, to the Emperor of China."

When I made this motion, Mr. GORMAN, a leading Democratic Senator, said:

"I am delighted that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. Blair] has made this motion that he has and offered the amendment that he has. It only demonstrates that we have acted in great haste," etc.

Mr. Blair further says:

The motion, the proposed amendment, and myself were all strongly assailed and defended, the debate proceeding with animation and occasionally with considerable heat until the 17th of September, when the motion failed by one vote, viz, 20 yeas and 21 nays.

Mr. President, in 1891 Senator Blair, with this record and without any solicitation on his own part, or on the part of any friend of his, was selected by the President of the United States as minister to China. He was rejected by China by means of telegrams which were sent to the acting minister here, and were by him called to the attention of Mr. Blaine. On the 29th of April, 1891, Mr. Blaine telegraphed to Mr. Blair, then at Chicago, on his way to China:

Better return to Washington.

Mr. Blair came to Washington, and on the 15th day of June, 1891, Mr. Wharton had this conversation with the Chinese minister:

In a conversation with the Chinese minister, had to-day at the Department, after referring to the communications from his Government already left by the minister at the Department stating its unwillingness to receive Mr. Blair as the accredited minister from this country, I asked him, entirely confidentially and unofficially, whether it was not possible that his Government had made its decision in the matter without being in possession of all the facts of the case. I stated to him that I wanted to feel that the decision had not been reached under any misapprehension, and I therefore requested him unofficially to telegraph his Government in an entirely informal manner, inquiring whether upon my offering to present all the facts of Mr. Blair's action exactly as they happened, for the complete and thorough information of the proper authorities, the Chinese Government would be willing to reconsider its decision and consider such new facts as might be so presented.

I wish the Senate to notice that Mr. Wharton did not condemn the reasons given by China; he did not present any facts in opposition to those reasons, but he simply asked the Chinese chargé whether his Government would hear the Government of the United States on the question:

The minister asked me what new facts we proposed to present.

I announced that I was not then prepared to say, but had simply to request a reopening of the matter by the Chinese Government, in order that I might have an opportunity to inform it fully of Mr. Blair's position, so that we could in this country have the satisfaction of feeling that the unwillingness of his Government to receive Mr. Blair, if it should so finally express itself, was based upon no misapprehension of fact.

The minister said that he would telegraph to his Government what I had said and would inform me of the answer as soon as received.

It must be noted that Mr. Blair was going to China in order to supersede Mr. Denby. Simultaneously with the request which Mr. Wharton made of the Chinese chargé d'affaires that the Chinese Government would kindly hear the Government of the United States on the question whether a Senator should be rejected as a minister on account of words spoken in debate in the Senate, and whether it would hear the United States on the question of allowing Mr. Denby, then in Pekin, to be superseded by Mr. Blair, Mr. Wharton telegraphed Mr. Denby:

[Telegram.]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, June 15, 1891.

Had an unofficial conversation with the Chinese minister to-day and suggested to him that perhaps Chinese Government had decided Blair case under misapprehension of facts. Minister promised to telegraph his Government and inquire whether they would reconsider their decision so that additional facts might be submitted. This entirely unofficially.

WHARTON.

So on the very day when the Acting Secretary of State requested the Chinese minister to ask the Chinese Government if it would hear new facts in reference to Mr. Blair a telegram was sent to Mr. Denby, who was to be superseded, in order that he might take such part in the proceedings as it might please him to take.

Mr. President, that was the only communication that was made by the United States Government in defense of Mr. Blair. It will be seen that it was merely this request, without an objection or a protest against rejection of a minister on such grounds. Mr. Blair fittingly closed his letter of June 22 as follows:

If the tests applied to my conduct in this case are to be acquiesced in by our Government, freedom of discussion in and out of the halls of legislation, and of intercourse between the Executive and Congress, will be ended on the one hand, or on the other representation of our country abroad by men who have taken part in public affairs must cease.

And therewith he tendered his resignation. On the 23d of June, the day after this letter was written and the resignation tendered, came the memorandum from the Chinese legation here in Washington, in which the objections to Mr. Blair are reiterated, but the statements are made which I have read, that if the Scott law can be repealed the Chinese Government will receive Mr. Blair notwithstanding anything he may have said.

Mr. Blair submitted another letter at a later period. The President accepted Mr. Blair's resignation on the 6th of October, and the same day, for the first time, we find an attempt made by the Administration to vindicate Mr. Blair, to defend him from the criticisms which had been made upon him by the Chinese Government, and to protest to that Government against the rejection of a minister from the United States on account of words spoken in debate in the United States Senate.

This was done in a letter of October 6, addressed by Mr. Wharton to Mr. Denby, and I call attention to the remarkable fact that there is not a particle of evidence anywhere that the views expressed in that communication have ever yet been called to the attention of the Chinese Government, or have ever yet reached the Chinese Government, or any representative of the Chinese Government. The letter of Mr. Wharton closes as follows:

As I have said, the incident is in fact closed by the action of Mr. Blair in placing his commission in the President's hands. That circumstance, however, does not make it less incumbent upon the Government of the United States to frankly and fully state its views touching the incident itself. Silence would ill comport with our own self-respect or be just to the Government of China.

I am, etc.,

WILLIAM F. WHARTON,
Acting Secretary.

Would not one suppose that the views contained in this letter written October 6, the first time at which pen was put to paper in defense of Mr. Blair or in protest against the action of the Chinese Government, would in some way reach the Chinese Government? Would it not be inferred that Mr. Denby would communicate these views to the Chinese Government after Mr. Wharton had said "silence would ill comport with our own self-respect or be just to the Government of China"? What followed? The next paper in the correspondence is the following:

Mr. Denby to Mr. Blaine.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES.
Peking, November 28, 1891. (Received January 8.)

SIR: I have the honor to state that I have read with great interest and complete concurrence your dispatch No. 659, of the 6th ultimo, wherein you discuss and deny the right of a foreign country to refuse, on an insufficient ground, stated and relied on, to receive an envoy duly accredited by the Government of the United States to its court.

Your dispatch will be of great service to this legation should the question involved ever arise here.

I have, etc.,

CHARLES DENBY.

So the protest of the Government of the United States, made after the Chinese Government had refused to receive a minister and demanded the repeal of a law, and said they would receive the minister if the law could be repealed, the protest of the Government of the United States against that action was sent to the minister in China who was to be superseded and filed by him in the archives at Peking, with the remark that "your dispatch will be of great service to this legation should the question involved ever arise here."

Mr. DAVIS. I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire if Mr. Blair had not resigned before that dispatch was sent, and the question become an abstract one so far as China was concerned?

Mr. CHANDLER. I should be unwilling to think that the Senator thought, when the Secretary of State wrote the Chinese minister that "silence would ill-comport with our own self-respect or be just to the Government of China," that the question had become so far an abstract one that the views of our Government must be kept secret from the Government of China. I do not think the Senator believes that.

Mr. DAVIS. I should like to ask the Senator if he does not think that the reply of our foreign office was an answer to a communication from the Chinese Government theretofore received at the State Department; that it grew out of the previous correspondence.

Mr. CHANDLER. It does not so appear, and I have undertaken to make it apparent to the Senator that there has been no correspondence on the subject; that there has not been a public record made except of conversations between Mr. Wharton and some person of the Chinese legation here, and that this Government did not put pen to paper until the 6th day of October, when it accepted Mr. Blair's resignation; while the protest to which the Acting Secretary of State then did put his name has, so far as we know, never come to the knowledge of the Chinese Government to this day.

Mr. DAVIS. Perhaps I was too narrow in the use of the word correspondence, but I should like to ask my friend from New Hampshire if the paper to which he is now referring was not the direct outcome and the consequence of the diplomatic intercourse, verbal or written, that had taken place between the State Department and the Chinese embassy or the Chinese foreign office?

Mr. CHANDLER. It had relation to the Blair case, if that is what the Senator means. But I say it was the first time the Administration, which of its own accord had pushed Mr. Blair into this office, ever put pen to paper to vindicate him in the humiliation which had been put upon him, and to protest to the Chinese Government that it could not reject ministers because of words in spoken debate in the United States Senate without disturbing the friendly relations between it and the United States Government. When the letter of October 6 was received by Mr. Denby, he filed it away and said the views met with his entire concurrence, and that the letter would be of great use should the question ever arise there.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL. Has the Senator from New Hampshire any information as to what reply, if any, the State Department received to the dispatch of March 25, 1892, from Wharton to Denby?

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, March 25, 1892.

If you have not already communicated Instruction 659, October 6, to the Chinese Government, do so immediately.

WHARTON, Acting.

What is the response to that, if any?

Mr. CHANDLER. That was sent less than a month ago. It was only when in January a resolution was passed calling upon the State Department for this correspondence, and a month later another resolution was adopted calling upon the President for the correspondence that Mr. Wharton seemed to have tried to find out whether the Chinese Government ever knew that we objected to their rejection of Mr. Blair on account of a speech made in the Senate. I call the attention of the Senator from Minnesota to the fact that this Government had never even said until October 6 that we did not regard the reasons as good. The Secretary of State had asked the minister whether the Chinese Government would hear the Government of the United States, and the minister said, "No; we will not hear the Government; we reject the minister; but if you will repeal the Scott law then we will take him, no matter what he has said."

When at last the President did cause his Acting Secretary of State to put upon paper a protest against this gross wrong that had been perpetrated upon a citizen of the United States it was sent to the legation in Peking; it met with the concurrence of the minister who was to be superseded, so he wrote, and he forthwith buried it in the archives and gravely informed the Secretary of State that it would be very useful if the question ever arose in Peking. Now, that the Senator from Minnesota has asked me a question about Mr. Blair's resignation, I venture to call attention to a further fact.

Mr. DAVIS. I wanted the Senator to fix the dates.

Mr. CHANDLER. When Mr. Blair wrote the letter of June 22 making his own vindication, which nobody had made for him, he tendered his resignation. On the 9th of July it appears that for reasons which are stated in his own memorial, now before the Committee on Foreign Relations, of which the Senator from Minnesota is a member, he recalled his resignation, as follows:

Mr. Blair to Mr. Wharton.

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 9, 1891.

DEAR SIR: I hereby withdraw the tender of my resignation as minister to China, made in my letter to the President of the 23d ultimo, now in your possession, and will thank you to inform the President.

I have, etc.,

HENRY W. BLAIR.

Mr. Wharton to Mr. Blair.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, July 10, 1891.

SIR: I have received your letter of the 9th instant, withdrawing the tender of your resignation as minister to China, made in your letter of the 23d ultimo, to the President, now in my possession; and, in accordance with your wish, I shall inform the President of your action this afternoon.

I am, sir, etc.,

WILLIAM F. WHARTON,
Acting Secretary.

But on the 6th of October the President accepted the resignation which had been withdrawn, and there is the whole record. On the 6th of October the Acting Secretary tried to vindicate Mr. Blair by a letter to Peking, which nobody ever knew of or heard anything of until these communications came into the Senate on the 4th of April, and the President on the same 6th of October accepted the resignation which had been withdrawn. The minister at China buried the vindication; but when Mr. Wharton came to contemplate the two resolutions of the Senate calling for the correspondence it seems for the first time to have occurred to him that Mr. Denby might not have communicated the views of this Government to the Chinese Government, and so he telegraphed him:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, March 25, 1892.

If you have not already communicated Instruction 659, October 6, to the Chinese Government, do so immediately.

WHARTON, Acting.

The Senator from Oregon asks me if anything has been heard since that date. I do not know whether anything has been received in reply to that communication, but I have been informed by the Senator from Oregon nearest me [Mr. DOLPH] that up to the 25th day of March, 1892, he has reason to believe that the Chinese Government had not received any knowledge of the contents of the letter of October 6, 1891.

Mr. DOLPH. I was so informed by a gentleman of intelligence and veracity, who undertook, I think, to speak on communication with the minister in this city.

Mr. MITCHELL. But is there information accessible now from any reliable source as to whether that communication has yet been delivered to the Chinese Government?

Mr. CHANDLER. There is not; and, moreover, while I am informed that Mr. Denby, the present minister, who has one son as his own secretary of legation, has another son in the employ of the Chinese Government in Peking, I can not learn from the State Department whether the latter fact is true or not, although I have inquired.

My information, I take occasion to say, came from Senator Blair himself, who told me that he had been informed that Minister Denby had a son in the employment of the Chinese Government at a large salary in Peking. If this is not so, if anyone will give me the exact facts and I find I am mistaken, I will withdraw the statement as publicly as I now make it.

But I submit that the conduct of our Government towards the Chinese Government, in view of the rejection of Mr. Blair, followed by the demand that the Scott law shall be repealed, has not been such as was due from the President, who had accredited Mr. Blair to China and sent him toward his work there, and was not such as was required by the dignity and the honor of the United States.

Mr. President, while I have said what I have thought I ought to say in relation to my late colleague, I am not insisting that his rejection as minister to China by itself should constitute a reason for our violating any treaty with that nation; but I do say that it is an incident in connection with our relations to the Chinese Government that has a bearing upon the question of the manner in which we shall do what we really wish to do about Chinese immigration.

We have not taken up the subject of Chinese immigration by diplomatic negotiation; since the treaty fell to the ground in the summer of 1888 we have allowed the question to remain still and dead until now.

We have permitted our accredited minister to be rejected under the circumstances which appear in this correspondence, and now we are told that we ought not to amend the House bill because it abrogates a little more of the treaty than the Senate substitute does; that our friendly and amicable relations with the Emperor of China are such that we should content ourselves with violating the treaty only a little by the reenactment of the law of 1888, of which the Chinese Government demands the repeal, stating that it will make the relations of the two countries much more friendly, and that, although it would prefer some Senator of the United States, if a Senator is sent, who has voted against these laws, still it will then take Mr. Blair or anybody whom the President may desire to send.

Mr. President, I hope the various amendments which I have submitted to the House bill will be adopted, and if any other amendments are needed, such as Senators may prepare, to soften the features of that bill and yet preserve it in substance, that those amendments will be made, and I then see no reason why the bill should not, under those conditions, go into the hands of a conference committee—which is, after all, the great method of legislation by Congress—and be there put in such shape that it may become a law, as properly as it may go into a conference committee through the total rejection of the House bill and the adoption of the substitute reported by the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, simply because it has this peculiar merit, that it violates the treaty a little less than the House bill violates it.

PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. BATE. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope that will be withheld until we shall see whether the pending bill can be disposed of to-night.

Mr. BATE. I am acting on the idea that the bill can not be concluded to-night.

Mr. SHERMAN. I shall feel bound to object to adjourning over owing to the nature of the pending business.

Mr. BATE. I will yield if it is desired by the Senator for any special purpose.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state to the Senator from Tennessee that it is important in any aspect of this question that it should be disposed of to-day or to-morrow, because it is believed by many Senators that the treaty and all arrangements respecting Chinese immigration will expire on the 6th day of May, which is only a few days off.

Mr. BATE. I shall certainly not press the motion if the Senator has any special reason.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have stated the reason. If Senators are not willing to remain to-night and pass the bill, and I suppose they are not, then let us meet to-morrow, take it up and dispose of it.

Mr. BATE. Very well; I withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is withdrawn.

EXCLUSION OF CHINESE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6185) to absolutely prohibit the coming of Chinese persons into the United States.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I have listened to the discussion of the bill under consideration, especially to the remarks of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER], with a great deal of interest. In my judgment very many momentous things are involved in the matter. This entire question of immigration, its quality, its extent, and in some places its fearful degeneration, afford not only themes for profound thought, but also for profound apprehension. I think it is well for the Senate and the country that the great activity and acumen of the Senator from New Hampshire, as chairman of the Committee on Immigration, can find ample scope in relation to these problems.

It is not alone, Mr. President, a question of immigration from China, but it is a question also of the class and quality of an influx which threatens to come to us from other places, of its effect upon the integrity of our institutions, upon the unity of our country. I do not wish for a moment to be conceived as at all attacking that great element of immigration out of which we have grown so great, so that this is the land where intelligence, virtue, and adaptability to the principles of self-government can find employment for their personal representatives, wherever born I go as far as anybody in acquiescing in the conviction that we can not guard too carefully against the irruptions into our population of those whose racial differences are so great as to set a wide gulf between them and us, which may not be passed; I also shall ask anyone to go as far as I am willing to go towards that other pole of this controversy—that we should protect the people of this country against an irruption of crime, unsocial elements, those agencies which are hostile to all governments, republics, or limited or absolute monarchies. This question is drawing around American intelligence a circle within which we must enter, and within which we must act. This Chinese question is the smallest segment of that circle.

We have been compelled to pass laws against undesirable immigration, applicable as well to Europe as to Asia, and much as has been said on this subject, much as attention has been directed to the Chinese aspect of this controversy, I venture to say that more illicit immigrants come into this country every year from Europe through the port of New York, or over the boundary line from Canada, than during the same period come from China by way of the coast of the Pacific.

Mr. President, I have no set remarks to make on this subject, and in a sort of discursive way shall present partly in explanation and partly in controversy of some things that the Senator from New Hampshire has said, what has occurred to me, and I do not expect to be at all consecutive.

Right here it occurs to me to mention, as illustrative of what I shall advance at somewhat more of length hereafter, that I do not understand that the Chinese Government as a government at all favors any exodus of its people. They are not a migrating race. Wherever they go they retain the animus revertendi; they domicile themselves in no foreign land; their children are not born in a foreign land; they do not expect to be buried in a foreign land.

So that in this matter we have not got to contend in its large and general aspect against the operations of a government which, as a government, is trying to impose its people upon us, to rid itself of a surplus population, to pour the Orontes of its vice into the Tiber of our virtues, as was complained of in ancient Rome.

We are dealing with a nation which is unwilling that its subjects shall come amongst us, which calls them back by its laws and customs, even the custom of burial, upon every opportunity. China, I understand, up to a certain time, when, I think, by very unwise action on our part our diplomatic relations became strained, in this particular aspect was considering, and it was to be hoped was willing, by treaty, to concede the thing which we finally took by our legal right of statutory enactment.

Elsewhere it is different. There is a race instinct in the European world which sends its population to this country, seeking in most instances to affiliate themselves with our institutions. There are other elements in those countries which send immigrants here because they belong to the criminal classes, and there are also vast turbulent classes there who seek refuge from a system of government where the policemen reign and order is made secure by armies, to a country which they fondly imagine to be going fast and loose, and which may be more easily subjected to every anarchistic, nihilistic, and socialistic idea of which society is sought to be made the prey.

Now, Mr. President, the fact is that the treaty of 1880 between the United States and China has not been observed by the United States in some particulars. There is not much use in caviling about the choice of words to express what our legislative action was, but certainly to say we "violated the treaty" is not the proper phrase. I agree entirely with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] in his opinion of the proper use of language in that respect. Under our system of government it was held by the Supreme Court of the United States in the Tobacco Cases, in Wallace, I think, and it has been held subsequently, that a treaty becomes a law by virtue of the cooperation of one branch of the law-making power with the executive, and can, so far as the instrumentalities and functions of our Government are concerned be, as to and by our Government, in all respects or in any particular respect, abrogated or annulled by statute. It is simply a governmental, constitutional, function of the United States to repeal or amend that which was a statute, namely, a treaty, which was the supreme law of the land.

But these nice discriminations as to the use of words do not do away with another consequence and consideration which lies far back of any matters which are involved in this discussion. While we have the legal right, the right of power, to abrogate or amend by legislative act a treaty, and do not violate that treaty in so doing, so far as physical violation is concerned, yet, Mr. President, if, in so doing, we take away or attack any rights which have been vested under that treaty, if we repeal that treaty before a time to which it has been stipulated by its terms it shall stand—if we undertake to and do make the condition of one of the contracting parties worse than it would have been if we had not so proceeded against it, then there has been a moral breach of our obligations, of which, as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] remarked a few moments ago, we must take the consequences.

Now, that we have done this thing in regard to China there is not a particle of doubt, and I am here frankly to say that for my own participation in the passage of that act of 1888 I have nothing but the profoundest regrets. No nation, however great, ever derived any lasting or ultimate benefit from thus proceeding against any nation, however weak or small.

We have proceeded in this way against a nation, august by its antiquity, that was old when the foundations of Rome were laid, which rested serenely in the bosom of untroubled centuries of repose until by force by other powers, and, so far as we are concerned, by pressure which was almost akin to physical force, she was compelled to unseal her boundaries and enter into relations with the civilized world.

It is a matter of history, Mr. President, that China never sought those relations which we are abusing. She was content through unnumbered centuries, and would have been content to-day, to remain as she was had other nations not enforced by forces, physical and moral, which were irresistible in their character, the relations of the civilized world upon her. She has a homogeneous and pacific people, strong in numbers—infinite strength—strong in her institutions, which are almost infinitely old; but she was and is a pacific people. There is not a warlike European nation to whom, as has been remarked, we should have dared to perpetrate the injustice of the act of 1888.

Now, I complain of this House bill because it is a rank, radical, unblushing, unmitigated repudiation of every treaty obligation which remains between us and China, and a disavowal of our duty to observe any rights vested under those treaties. I say, without at present going into detail in this matter, that that is an act which this country can not afford to do. It has been said by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] that we admit that certain portions of this treaty have been violated; but I assert that the violation of one portion of a treaty by one party does not suspend or abrogate the entire treaty. The offended government can, it is true, at its will denounce the unviolated portions of the treaty and annul them by reason of the breach of the obligation made by the offending government, but China has never done this. Our commercial relations with her go on as usual; all the instrumentalities of intercourse, so far as provided by treaties, are in full and efficient operation.

Of course, Mr. President, it was a matter of deep personal regret to every one who has the pleasure of knowing Senator Blair, that he was not received by the Chinese Government as the minister of the United States. Personally I think, and probably personally everybody here thinks, that an injustice was done to him; but if there is any one thing settled in the law and principles of diplomatic intercourse it is this, that where a person accredited from one country to another is not persona—I dislike that phrase—is not personally acceptable to the receiving Government, all that Government has to do is simply to state that as a reason why he will not be received, and it is not obliged to go any further.

The reasons can not properly, and they never do properly, except by courtesy, and then with no consequence as to the result of the argument, become a matter of diplomatic debate or intercourse. Governments do not in such case reason with each other except in some such gossiping way as between the Chinese minister and Mr. Wharton, as to the personal reasons why an accredited minister is not gratifying to the feelings of the country to which he is sent. A simple statement of the objection ends the case. The Chinese Government in this case did precisely what it had the right to do; did precisely what this Government did in principle in the case of citizen Genet before the beginning of this century, when it sent him away; precisely in principle what we did as to Sir Sackville West; precisely what the court of Austria did as to our own Government within the last ten years, when it took exception against our minister on the ground of his religious faith. We could make no objection.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator allow me a question?

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have obtained the correspondence concerning the rejection of Mr. Kelley both by Italy and Austria, and Mr. Bayard states very distinctly the right and duty of the United States, when a Government gives reasons, to remonstrate against the character of those reasons.

Mr. DAVIS. Why, of course, Mr. President, I do not find any fault with the Government for standing up for its own citizen and remonstrating, but the idea, because Mr. Blair has been declared to be personally not acceptable to China, that our international duties, our treaty obligations, and our duty to abstain from violating them in the manner proposed, and to the extent proposed, by this House bill—the idea that those duties are abrogated by that discussion, is that which I am trying to controvert.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator will allow me, no one has made any such assertion as that.

Mr. DAVIS. Now, let me ask the Senator a question. Does not Mr. Bayard in that same dispatch take precisely the position I took a moment ago?

Mr. CHANDLER. I will read the sentence, if the Senator will allow me.

Mr. DAVIS. If the Senator will read that sentence I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will read it. August 31, 1885, Mr. Bayard says:

Nations, like individuals, are the proper guardians of their own self-respect and honor, and the people of the United States must decide upon their acceptance of the novel conditions of diplomatic intercourse which have been set up and insisted upon by Austria-Hungary in the case of Mr. Kelley.

Mr. Bayard makes a vigorous and manly and eloquent protest against the rejection by Austria-Hungary of Mr. Kelley for the reason assigned by that Government for making the rejection. Of course he does not deny the right of Austria-Hungary to refuse to receive Mr. Kelley, but when Austria-Hungary refused to receive him on certain untenable grounds, Mr. Bayard deemed it his duty to make most vigorous and earnest and manly and honorable and creditable protest.

Mr. DAVIS. So he did; but as I am enabled to read by the courtesy of my friend, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], Mr. Bayard proceeded to say:

While thus making reply to the only reason stated by your Government as the cause of its un readiness to receive Mr. Kelley, permit me also to remark that the President fully recognizes the highly important and undoubted right of every Government to decide for itself whether the individual presented as the envoy of another state is or is not an acceptable person, and, in the exercise of its own high and friendly discretion, to receive or not the person so presented. This right, so freely accorded by the United States to all other nations, its Government would insist upon should an occasion deemed to be proper arise.

Mr. CHANDLER. Now, Mr. President—

Mr. DAVIS. I hope the Senator will allow me to go on.

Mr. CHANDLER. In that connection, will the Senator permit me to make another statement?

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. In this same letter Mr. Bayard says:

Whilst this Government concedes as freely as it exercises the right to refuse to receive an envoy, yet when that right is so exaggerated and expanded as to become a virtual claim of the function of selection as well as of rejection we must demur.

And then, when he states the reason, Mr. Bayard says:

These considerations are simply intolerable.

The issues thus raised are grave, and I will not now pursue their discussion, as they will in all probability be submitted to the representatives of the American people upon the meeting of the two Houses of Congress in December next.

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, and he then proceeded to acquiesce in the position taken by the Austrian Government and sent another minister to Austria, where he was received.

Mr. President, China, while protesting against the passage of the act of 1888, crying out against its existence, asking that it be repealed, does not say as a condition that unless these things are undone it will receive no person as a minister from the United States. It does not declare that no person can be accredited from this country to that and received until that obnoxious statute is repealed. It simply says—and gives a reason which no one here thinks is a valid one—that it will not receive Mr. Blair. It was not obliged to give any reason whatever for it. All it had to say was that this person is not acceptable, as in the old jingle:

I do not love thee, Doctor Fell,
The reason why I can not tell;
But this alone I know full well,
I do not love thee, Doctor Fell.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator allow me—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield?

Mr. DAVIS. I should prefer that my friend from Oregon would not interrupt me.

Mr. MITCHELL. Very well.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, let us consider for a moment in a cursory way what this House bill proposes to do. We must premise by conceding that at this time and for many years there has been a large number, and now a lessening number of Chinese in this country, rightfully here, to whom the faith of our Government is pledged by treaty stipulations for their protection the same as citizens of the most favored nation. That these rights of residence, of going and coming, and perhaps to a certain extent of the right to acquire property are the creations of our solemn laws, a treaty, the law of the land, that we have impaired those rights in some degree in the exercise of the attempt of prevention does not absolve us from any obligation which binds us to that country.

By the treaty of 1880 it was provided that the United States might regulate, limit, or suspend the coming or residence of Chinese laborers, but should not prohibit it; that other Chinese and Chinese laborers now in the United States should be allowed to come and go freely—stipulations plainly repudiated by this bill.

This bill provides that it shall be unlawful for any Chinese person, except such Chinese person or persons as may be duly accredited to the Government of the United States as ministers plenipotentiary or other diplomatic representatives, consuls-general, etc., to come to, or within, or to land at any port or place within the United States, whether for the purpose of transit only or otherwise.

All that is absolutely prohibited, and in another section further along, as if to make an exhibition of our bad faith and plainly avow and glory in it, the treaty which gave these rights is expressly repealed, annulled, and abrogated. Such, I think, are the expressions.

Well, what does that first section mean, Mr. President? It means the practical suspension of all intercourse between these countries. It certainly means, if China is a nation of any spirit whatever, the entire suspension of all diplomatic relations between that country and this. Here, while we are anticipating the unexampled prosperity which we are enjoying, and are about to enjoy, through trade with foreign lands, we deliberately, by statutory annulment of a treaty with the oldest and most populous and undoubtedly the wealthiest empire in the world, although little is accurately known of its resources, close up every avenue of trade and commercial intercourse.

As my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. SAWYER] suggests, it is a sword which cuts both ways; and the question may be asked what is to become of our people in China in such a total dissolution of all relations, social, business, religious, and diplomatic? The Chinese are absolved from protecting anybody, great public feeling being excited there as here. Our people massacred the Chinese at Rock Springs. Can any better action be expected towards our people from those who do not possess one virtue in the world, according to my friend, the Senator from California [Mr. FELTON], and yet who have preserved a state upon an immutable foundation for perhaps five thousand years?

That is an immense commerce, Mr. President, we are throwing away. To get at it England made the opium war, and grasped Hong-kong; to acquire it, the French established themselves in Tonquin, Cochinchina, Annam, and Cambodia, and the civilized world brought all its moral and physical forces to bear upon that Empire, until twenty-four ports—I think that is the number—were made free and open. We propose to give that commerce over to foreign nations who are more sensible and of better faith than we; to cut ourselves off entirely from any commercial intercourse with these people; to go further, and break down the work of those good men and women who for more than fifty years have been seeking to establish the religion of our Redeemer in those lands, simply because there exists in our midst a decreasing remnant, brought here at our solicitation, and that too of the most undesirable classes in that Empire.

Why, we all remember when that treaty was made whereby those people came here; how it filled the gap of labor upon the Pacific coast; how the Chinese shoemaker was taken to Massachusetts, I believe; how, when the rewards of gold and silver mining were such upon the Pacific coast that the white man's labor was too costly for ordinary purposes; when the Central Pacific Railroad could not have been taken over the mountains without these men, it was then considered a great boon to American industry, and a great triumph of American diplomacy that this docile population, working for cheap wages, were introduced.

I freely admit that in the process of time and with the increase of population upon the coast their presence there seems to be no longer desirable. I suppose it can not be denied that we have there the least desirable people of the Chinese Empire, and accordingly our legislation has proceeded, and without strenuous resistance by the Chinese Government, from year to year to stop that influx of population. If the statistics quoted by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] the other day are correct, the Chinese population in the United States has been decreasing from year to year.

For the quarter ending September 30, 1891, the imports and exports of merchandise to China and Hongkong and Japan—I can not separate them, because they are not separated in the statistical register—with the United States for the quarter ending September 30, 1891 were, imports $10,954,000; the exports were $3,488,000 for the quarter of the year, and of this for that quarter of the year San Francisco had $4,236,000 of the imports and $968,000 of the exports. In the year 1890 the trade of Great Britain to China, exclusive of Hongkong, was imports into China $33,000,000 in round numbers; the exports to Great Britain were $18,000,000. For the same year the imports from the United States into China were about $5,000,000 and the exports about $11,000,000.

That is the kind of commerce, a growing commerce, which we are asked to give up to our rivals simply because under present processes and, perhaps, through the defective administration of the laws, we can not get rid of those people fast enough.

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator allow me to put right in there one statement?

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. The cotton manufacturers of the United States recognize the fact that China is the most promising country in the whole world, and more promising than all the rest of the countries of the world, for the exportation of our cotton manufacturers to, and that exportation has been increasing very rapidly within the last year.

Mr. DAVIS. I am very glad the Senator from Maine reminds me of that fact, and it also reminds me of a very interesting statement that I heard made the other day by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], who is so universally informed upon everything known. He stated that a cotton manufacturer in Alabama took into consideration the situation and, he being a man of judgment, went to New York and saw the Chinese consul to find out precisely the kind of cotton goods that his countrymen would take. He went back to Alabama and made those goods honestly, as he was told to do. He sent samples to the consul, who sent them to China for inspection, and they were inspected not as we inspect goods, but every thread was taken out, and they went through such a course of inspection the like of which I never heard. The consequence of that was that that Alabama manufacturer got Chinese orders and is getting them to-day, and the whole establishment, with all its powers, is devoted to the production of cotton for that market.

Mr. President, I do not think there is enough in this Chinese question as it is and as it promises to be to warrant doing what the House bill proposes we shall do. I do not see any danger of the submergence of 65,000,000 of people by the 110,000 Chinese who are now in this country, and who are rapidly decreasing, and can only be increased by a scattering few hundred who may come over our lines in the course of a year.

I said a few moments ago the Chinese Government is not seeking to take possession of our institutions. It has no such desire. It does not care to see its people go abroad; it requires them to come back. I wish, Mr. President, the case were so all over the rest of the world. I wish that in another continent, where the authorities are willing that certain classes of their people may be suffered to come to this country, they would not seek to possess themselves of our institutions or unduly to influence them. There is more matter for profound concern in the attempts of Herr Cahensly made last year to denationalize American institutions and plant as many nations as there are people of foreign tongues in our midst than in all the Chinese questions which have arisen since 1858.

He proposes to use the power of the Catholic hierarchy to bring about this great political result. I rejoice that I can speak upon this subject without the offense of bringing in religious matters, because it is infinitely to his renown that Leo XIII, the greatest statesman since Ganganelli who has sat in the chair of St. Peter, repulsed the attempt as soon as it was formally submitted to him. But this attempt was not instigated by the American hierarchy at all. I believe it met with the reprobation of Cardinal Gibbon, and I have reason to know it met with the reprobation of Archbishop Ireland.

The memorial of Herr Cahensly, who is not a prelate—he is a layman, a member of the Prussian Diet, intimate with Dr. Windthorst, whose letter he adopted—in his memorial presented to the Vatican said:

6. The want of representatives of the different nationalities of emigrants in the episcopate.

As every nationality has its own characteristics, its own habits and customs, it is important, also, that the priests should not only speak the language of the emigrants, but that they should be of the very same nation. Hence it is desirable that every different national group of emigrants should be organized into a distinct parish, with a priest of its own nationality.

Some are of the opinion that the language can not be kept beyond the second generation, and that the grandchildren of the immigrants will certainly speak nothing but English.

The facts of experience offer triumphant objections to this opinion.

It is part of this scheme that the various foreign languages shall be perpetuated in this country by this segregation of people according to their nationalities. I am speaking solely of the political aspects of this question. For my part, Protestant born and Protestant bred, I do not care what kind of bishops are sent to this country as a matter of faith. Where it touches political questions, I deem it right to call the attention of the country to it. As to matters of faith they can send them to us as in partibus infidelium for all that I care.

I desire to reiterate that this most impudent attempt to bring to bear the elements of various nationalities upon our institutions met with the stern reprehension of that great ecclesiastical statesman who presides over the Vatican. But the movement is going on in its political aspect, and is being pressed to-day.

We, a nation of diverse people, of one language and of many creeds, are building upon the basis of Christianity a national edifice that aspires to the heavens, and it is plotted to scatter the builders by a Babel confusion of tongues.

We would—continues the memorial—

We would think it a gross pretension were any particular nationality to arrogate to itself the mission of Americanizing the others.

We do not want any foreign nationality to Americanize the American people.

In the United States, where the church is composed of immigrated nations that are already civilized and Christianized, but differ in character, habits, and customs, as well as language, this need of national bishops representing the respective nations, makes itself imperiously felt.

Why should there be a representative of that kind for any nation in the bosom of American citizenship?

Again, the harmony and concord between the different nationalities are affected by this question.

Various nationalities that come into America are to be settled and provided for by a foreign instrumentality.

If the episcopate be handed over almost exclusively to one single nationality, to the detriment of the others, a feeling of uneasiness, of general discontent, is created among these last, a feeling which assumes the proportions of jealous national rivalries, feelings wounded and shocked in every sacred right and interest belonging to these same nations.

It is perfectly amazing throughout this entire memorial how utterly oblivious this intruder is to the fact that there is an American nationality, an American people, destined to become throughout an American stock. We are to his mind a nation upon whom the political intrigues of the European world are to operate all their own theories at their own sweet will. The idea of American nationality consolidated into a unity is to be combated by alien influences, operated by foreign governments, and for as many tongues and as for as many people as there are tongues we are to be relegated, if it is possible, to the condition in which the polyglot Indian tribes were when this country was discovered.

It is desired and wished—

So proceeds the memorial—that concord and harmony should reign among the different nations that go to make up the church of the United States; nothing is more desirable, nothing more essential.

The sole and only way to attain this end is to give to every one of these nations bishops of their own, bishops belonging to each, who will represent their respective nations in the episcopal body just as those nations are represented among the parochial clergy and among the faithful.

Every nation that has not its bishops is an uncrowned nation, a nation without chiefs, without protectors, without guides of its own, a nation without head, a decapitated nation, that feels itself profoundly humiliated, sacrificed, consequently a discontented and jealous nation, a nation that will never live in harmony with better-favored nations which it accuses of defrauding it of its rights and wounding it in its sacred interests.

How beautiful that would be from any standpoint, even of the gentleman who penned that memorial or the convention which adopted it! It had not conceived the idea of a composite American nation of one language and one blood, but instead of that the disintegrating idea of many nations arrayed against one another and represented by people from abroad, appointed from foreign lands, who can not speak our language, but appointed here because they speak the foreign tongue, appointed here for the purpose of perpetuating it through the first and second generations.

Again he says—

Moreover, this question affects the interests of the countries from which emigration takes place.

This, to my mind, is the most important part of the document—

Moreover, this question affects the interests of the countries from which emigration takes place. Through their emigrants the nations are acquiring in the great Republic an influence and an importance of which they will one day be able to make great profit.

These nations are so well aware of this that they are doing everything in their power to have those of their nationalities settled in the United States develop and strengthen themselves in every respect. The time has come when governments can no longer remain indifferent to this grave and important question.

For example, is it a matter of no consequence to England, Ireland, France, Germany, Italy, Canada, Hungary, Spain, and other governments that they number in a youthful country, and one full of prospects, millions of fellow-citizens, forming part of the nation, and taking an active part in industry, commerce, politics, social life, and public affairs?

It must not be lost sight of that the American nation, the people of the United States, is not a people of one race only, but of all races, of all nationalities. Every race, every nationality may take its place in the sunlight. Precisely owing to this fact, and because religion is the corner-stone and the keystone of every social fabric, the nations have an immense interest in their emigrants being represented in the episcopate of the United States by bishops of their own.

There was never, Mr. President, a more infamous attempt to prostitute religious power to political purposes than the one proposed in that memorial. This man is no inconsiderable man. He moves with no inconsiderable allies. He is, or was, a member of the Prussian Diet. It is stated that Herr von Schloetzer, the German representative at Rome, is in hearty accord with him and supported this memorial; that Austrian families of high rank, moving in noble and royal circles, were interested in the scheme. It is to the glory of the American Catholic hierarchy that they have fought this proposition and are fighting it to-day. With a man less wise than the present Pontiff very serious consequences might have ensued.

I have not gone out of my way to bring this subject here. It forces itself upon the attention in the present connection, and it so far dwarfs by contrast the dangers to be apprehended from China that I could not refrain from doing it. Reading all that has been said against the Chinese, and reading and pondering what has been attempted, how infinitely Confucius rises above Cahansey.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER].

Mr. McPHERSON. Let the amendment be reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 3 of the text of the original House bill, after the word "that," it is proposed to insert "for fifteen years;" so as to read:

That for fifteen years from and after the passage of this act it shall be unlawful for any Chinese person or persons, etc.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. Is it the policy and purpose of the Senate to act upon the amendments of the Senator from New Hampshire before they act upon the amendments of the Committee on Foreign Relations?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This is a perfection of the text of that which is proposed to be stricken out, and therefore, under the rule, this is a proper amendment and in order.

Mr. SHERMAN. We are all familiar with the rule. Amendments are quite in order to the original House bill as it stands, and so amendments to the amendment of the Senate committee are in order; but I suggest to Senators whether, under the circumstances, we had not better take one test vote as between the two propositions, and then let amendments be offered to that proposition. I ask unanimous consent, if that is in order, and I suppose it is, that that course may be pursued. It is the only way by which we can avoid the numerous votes which otherwise will be necessary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio asks unanimous consent of the Senate that the vote first be taken on the amendment proposed by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SHERMAN. And then that be open to amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If that shall be adopted by the Senate the amendment of the committee will then be open to amendment, and if it shall be lost the text of the House bill, which is proposed to be stricken out, will be open to amendment.

Mr. FELTON. Before the vote is taken I desire to say that I listened attentively to the remarks of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] yesterday and to the remarks which have been submitted to-day—

Mr. HOAR. Has unanimous consent been given to take the question in the form suggested?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not so understand. He supposed the Senator from California [Mr. FELTON] had risen for the purpose of debating it.

Mr. HOAR. I understood the Senator from California to say before the question was put he wished to address the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from California rise to object to the unanimous consent asked for?

Mr. FELTON. Yes, sir. I simply desire to say that I listened attentively to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] yesterday, and also to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS] who has just spoken. They spoke of the bill as it came from the other House. It is not the intention of any Senator upon the floor, as I understand, to pass that bill, if it were possible, in the shape in which it came from the House. The amendments to that bill have not been read, and many Senators are not aware of what the effect of those amendments will be.

Now, sir, as I understand it, the amendments which have been submitted, and one or two additional amendments which I have to submit, will make this bill precisely what the present law is, with this exception: It will provide means which will prevent Chinese coming across the border. It will obviate the greatest difficulty, and that is where there is more fraud and more corruption than in anything else in connection with this subject, the return of cool laborers under the guise of merchants.

I undertake to say, at the expense of repeating myself, that there is no such class as a merchant class. The law is avoided; it is evaded. All that we on the Pacific coast desire is simply to make the present law operative, and by the amendments proposed this bill will make it operative and in no sense violate the treaty any further than it has already been violated. It was thought that the House bill could be amended better than the substitute reported by the Senate committee, and hence the discussion has occurred upon that bill.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask the Senator from California if those amendments may not apply just as well to the substitute of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations?

Mr. FELTON. I think not.

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, yes; they can.

Mr. FELTON. I do not desire to antagonize the wish of the Senate. Of course I will defer to the opinion of older and wiser men, but if we shall have an opportunity to present these amendments, which I have not had time to do, because my attention has been turned to the other bill, then I shall have no objection to taking the course proposed.

Mr. DOLPH. I understand it to be part of the agreement that any amendments may be received if the substitute shall be adopted.

Mr. CULLOM. The substitute of the Senate committee will be opened to amendments.

Mr. FELTON. In justice to myself and the people I represent I do not want to see the opportunity cut off for proposing amendments.

Mr. SHERMAN. My proposition was simply that we take up one or the other of the two propositions and perfect it. I prefer to take that course and act upon the amendment of the Committee on Foreign Relations, with the understanding distinctly that the amendment if adopted shall be open to amendment to strike out, to insert, to change or to add to it in any way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request for unanimous consent as stated?

Mr. CHANDLER. I object—

Mr. HISCOCK. Do I understand the Senator objects to our having a test vote?

Mr. CHANDLER. I have not finished my sentence yet. I will do so. I object for the purpose of saying that I have had some consultation with Senators who desire the House bill perfected, amended, and changed in some respects. I said myself in the opening of my remarks that it was not material to me whether this bill went to conference upon the Senate amendment or the text of the House bill. I also said that what I was especially desirous of accomplishing was such an amendment of the present law or such an addition to the present law as will keep out this immigration by land from Mexico and from British Columbia.

There are certain clauses in the Senate bill which make the proposed new law more severe than the existing law now is, and it is possible that the precise object which I desire to accomplish may be accomplished by an additional clause to the Senate substitute. I will do what is thought advisable by the Senator from Oregon. If, however, the Senate amendment reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations should be adopted, time should be given to submit to the amendment reported by the committee other amendments which may be thought desirable.

Mr. SHERMAN. Would it be sufficient to let it go over, then, after that course is taken, until to-morrow?

Mr. CHANDLER. Yes, until to-morrow.

Mr. BUTLER. Let us have the vote first.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I had intended to make some observations on this general subject, but if a vote can be had this evening on the whole question, so as to dispose of it, I shall forego doing so and shall not occupy the time of the Senate at all. If, however, that can not be done, I should like to take the floor.

Mr. DOLPH. I should like to state that the proposition of the Senator from Ohio is that a test vote be taken to determine whether we proceed with the House bill or the Senate substitute. In either case the bill we adopt is to be open to amendment and, of course, discussion for any length of time; that is to say, if the Senate substitute be adopted, any Senator can offer an amendment to add any portion of the House bill.

Mr. MITCHELL. I can only speak for myself individually. That will be perfectly agreeable to me.

Mr. DOLPH. It would not cut off anybody.

Mr. MITCHELL. I prefer the House bill most decidedly to the Senate bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will withdraw my amendment, and let the vote be taken on the amendment proposed by the Senate committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator withdraws his amendment.

Mr. CHANDLER. Not exactly. I withdraw all my amendments if none others are offered, and the vote can then be taken on the Senate substitute, with the understanding that time shall be given to make amendments to that substitute.

Mr. BUTLER. That is the proposition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment being withdrawn, the question is on the substitute reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, is it the intention of the Senate to attempt to close the debate this evening?

Several SENATORS. Oh, no.

Mr. SHERMAN. Senators are not willing to stay to-night.

Mr. MITCHELL. Then I hope the Senate will adjourn.

Mr. SHERMAN. The pending proposition is the text upon which amendments will be made, and the Senator will have as full opportunity of discussion as he has now. All we do is to save the trouble of amending two separate and distinct propositions when the final vote must be taken on one or the other.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is perfectly agreeable to me; and if I desire to say anything at all I desire to say it before that vote is taken. I do not know that it will influence anybody, but upon that proposition I desire to be heard.

Mr. DOLPH. I say to my colleague that I suppose we can offer any provision of the House bill as an amendment to the Senate substitute.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am perfectly willing that the vote shall be taken on either proposition and amended afterwards, but before that vote is taken, if discussion is to proceed, I wish to have my say.

Mr. CHANDLER. I understand the Senator from Oregon to wish that there should be a test vote taken, and that the yeas and nays may be called. Now, I understand him further to say that he would like to speak before the vote is taken.

Mr. MITCHELL. Certainly, unless we can proceed to vote on all the propositions and decide them. If we can do that, then I shall refrain from speaking.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I propose to address some observations to the Senate upon the subject of this bill, and while I am entirely willing to remain here if the rest of the Senators are, I suppose that the discussion will not be continued into the night. I am indifferent as to whether the vote shall be taken upon the House bill or the Senate substitute, but I suggest to the Senator from Oregon that if the vote results in the substitution of the Senate amendment, then his observations, of course, will not be in place, and he will have to go over the same ground again. If the Senate by a test vote displaces the House bill and puts the substitute before the Senate and he desires to amend it again, he will be going back to the House bill.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. PLATT. Will the Senator withdraw that to allow me to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business for a few moments?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 5 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened and (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, April 23, 1892, at 12 o'clock m.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER. On yesterday a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, relating to certain claims growing out of the Oregon and Washington Indian war of 1855-56, was erroneously referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. They are audited claims, and ought to go to the Committee on Appropriations.

Without objection, that change of reference will be made. The Chair did not observe that they were audited claims.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:
To Mr. PATTON, for this day, on account of important business.
To Mr. SHONK, for one week, on account of important business.
To Mr. WILSON of West Virginia, for five days, on account of important business.

REPRINT OF A BILL.

By unanimous consent, on motion of Mr. STEVENS, the bill (H. R. 5572) was ordered reprinted, the supply having been exhausted.

VACANCIES ON BOARD OF MANAGERS OF NATIONAL SOLDIERS' HOME.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report to the House the joint resolution (H. Res. 97) and request its immediate passage. The title is "Joint resolution (H. Res. 97) to fill vacancies which will occur in the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers on April 21, 1892." It will be observed that the vacancies occurred on the 21st of April, 1892, and it should have been disposed of before.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That Gen. William J. Sewell, Gen. Martin T. McMahon, Capt. John L. Mitchell, and Maj. George Bonebrake be, and are hereby, appointed managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers for the term of office commencing on the 21st day of April, 1892, to fill vacancies which will occur by expiration of terms of office.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution just read?

Mr. LOUD. I object.

INVESTIGATION OF CERTAIN NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on Banking and Currency to submit the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk, and ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency have leave to sit during the sessions of the House, and that for the purpose of conducting the investigation ordered to be made by said committee, there be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, on the draft of the chairman, the necessary funds for that purpose in sums not exceeding $500 at one time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. BAILEY. I did not understand the reading of the resolution, and would like to have it read again.

The resolution was read again.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Speaker, several important matters of a general nature have been referred to that committee and not reported back, and without some excuse is given for it I shall object to the consideration of this resolution.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

SAFETY OF NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Banking and Currency to report back to the House the bill (H. R. 5681) "for the better control of and to promote the safety of national banks" with Senate amendments, with the recommendation that the Senate amendments be nonconcurring in, and that the request of the Senate for a committee of conference be agreed to.

The title of the bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5681) for the better control of and to promote the safety of national banks.

The SPEAKER. This is a House bill with Senate amendments. The Senate requests a conference, and the Committee on Banking and Currency report the bill back with the recommendation that the Senate amendments be nonconcurring in, and that the conference asked for be agreed to.

Mr. MCRAE. Mr. Speaker, does that require unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. MCRAE. Then what is the purpose of the committee?

Mr. BACON. The purpose is to nonconcur in these Senate amendments and get the bill back to the House without the amendments on it, the Committee on Banking and Currency not thinking the amendments ought to be there.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Senate amendments are nonconcurring in and the conference asked for agreed to. The Chair will appoint the conferees during the day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill?

Mr. McMILLIN. Reserving the right to object, I ask that the amendments be read.

The amendments were read, as follows:

In line 5, strike out the word "forty" and insert "twenty-five;" and in line 8, after the word "twelve," insert "said pension to be in lieu of the amount now drawn by her."

Mr. CROSBY. I would like to have the report read.

The report was read for information.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. KILGORE. I think we had better have the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas demands the regular order. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. O'FERRALL. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia calls up the contested-election case of Noyes against Rockwell, and the Clerk will read the resolutions.

Mr. O'FERRALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that gentlemen who have reports from committees to make may be permitted to hand them to the Clerk.

Mr. McMILLIN. I think there should be a call of the committees for reports.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee objects.

Mr. ENLOE. I would like to know if the question of consideration can be raised on the contested-election case.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it can.

Mr. ENLOE. Then I raise the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia calls up the contested-election case of Noyes against Rockwell, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE] raises the question of consideration against that; and the question is, Will the House proceed to consider the contested-election case?

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

NOYES AGAINST ROCKWELL.

The resolutions were read, as follows:

Resolved, That Hosea H. Rockwell was not elected a Representative to the Fifty-second Congress from the Twenty-eighth Congressional district of New York and is not entitled to the seat.

Resolved, That Henry T. Noyes was elected a Representative to the Fifty-second Congress from the Twenty-eighth Congressional district of New York and is entitled to the seat.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York [Mr. FELLOWS].

[Mr. FELLOWS withholds his remarks for revision. See Appendix.]

Mr. FELLOWS. I yield seventeen minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN].

Mr. O'FERRALL. Now, Mr. Speaker, that time was yielded to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FELLOWS].

Mr. FELLOWS. It is therefore in my control; is it not?

Mr. O'FERRALL. I do not understand it that way.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not think that it is a good proposition to say—

Mr. CUMMINGS. I ask unanimous consent that that time may be yielded to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN].

Mr. COCKRAN. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has not completed what he had to say. The practice of the House has been, so far as the observation of the present occupant of the chair goes, to allow gentlemen, when they have been conceded time, to transfer that time. Under that practice the Chair thinks the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] will be entitled to proceed.

Mr. O'FERRALL. I will not appeal, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. COCKRAN. I want to say to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. O'FERRALL] that there will be no disposition to curtail his time; that we want this matter as fairly presented to the House as it possibly can be; and I am perfectly certain that he will be as generous to this side as we will prove generous to him when he comes to close the debate.

Mr. O'FERRALL. I will say to the gentleman, however, that they have occupied much more time upon that side than we have occupied.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I have a paper in my hand from the Speaker's clerk, showing that the time occupied by the friends of Mr. Rockwell up to last night was seven hours, and the time occupied for Mr. Noyes was six hours and thirty-five minutes, so there is only a difference of twenty-five minutes.

Mr. O'FERRALL. The gentleman from Alabama is as annoying to the House as a mosquito in New Jersey. [Laughter.]

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I want to say to the gentleman from Virginia that he can not bulldoze me. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. COCKRAN. No; and I hope my seventeen minutes are being kept intact.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House will be in order.

Mr. O'FERRALL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] can proceed if the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] will allow him to do so. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] is entitled to the floor, and the House will please be in order.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Speaker, this question has been discussed so fully, so thoroughly, and so ably, that so far as the presentation of the facts is concerned, it would be an utterly unnecessary task to attempt to elaborate them any further at this stage of the proceedings. I am rather induced to address the House because of the extraordinary process of reasoning which has been adopted by some of the gentlemen who have supported the majority of the committee and by a desire to point out to them the conclusion to which their logic must necessarily tend.

A gentleman to whom I have always looked up as one of the best lawyers in the House [Mr. CHIPMAN] closed the discussion last night with the extraordinary proposition—and I trust he will correct me if I do not state his proposition with accuracy—that although these Doyle ballots may be bribed, corrupted, fraudulent, inasmuch as there is no legislative provision declaring that a bribed vote shall be void, therefore the votes are good and valid and sufficient to elect a member of this House and to maintain him in his seat. Is that the proposition which the gentleman stated to us?

Mr. CHIPMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCKRAN. I would be glad to have the gentleman state whether I have quoted him correctly or incorrectly.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I made no such proposition, with all respect to the gentleman from New York. My proposition is that until those ballots are proved to be corrupt they must stand.

Mr. COCKRAN. Surely the gentleman did not take twenty minutes to establish that proposition.

Mr. CHIPMAN. But allow me to say to the gentleman on his proposition, that it has been denied all the way through upon your side of this case.

Mr. COCKRAN. It is a little extraordinary, after all that has been said, that we should still be in doubt as to what was meant on the one side or the other.

Now, if I understood the gentleman's argument yesterday, it was that while all the proof pointed to the corruption of these Doyle ballots, nevertheless, as there was no specific penalty against bribery which would exclude them from the ballot box, you can not by implication extend a penal statute so as to make the exclusion of a ballot the penalty of corruption, and it was to that proposition, as I understood it, that for twenty minutes he addressed himself in the closing hour.

Now, that is the naked, bald, proposition that I desire to submit to the members who support the position of the majority. I want to submit that right here to this House, so that every man present will understand precisely the character of the contention upon which the majority has planted itself, and that is whether bribery, corruption, treason itself, when practiced by the enemy, shall be taken to the bosom of the majority against which it was leveled and suckled into an effective political force, sacred before the laws of this country. Why, sir, if there were no contest before the House, if Mr. Noyes sat in this seat, and nobody appeared to question his right to represent his district, and it became apparent to the members of this body that one single vote cast for him had been purchased; that he was the beneficiary of one single vote acquired by corrupt and discreditable methods, it would be the duty of this House, and it would be the duty of every member of it, under the Constitution, to expel him as something too unclean for contact with honorable men. [Loud applause.]

We who for the last four years have been denouncing the corruption of the party represented by the gentlemen on the other side of the House, if the theory of the majority be correct, must apologize in sackcloth and ashes to the men whom we have denounced. If this be the correct doctrine, let us apologize to Mr. Dudley, of Indiana, and declare that the expression in his letter referring to "blocks of five" was a noble and enlightened expression. If a corrupt and purchased vote be good, it is equal to the vote of the best and most upright citizen. You can not have anything better than a good and valid vote. Now, we are told that with all the marks of corruption appearing on these 16 ballots; with the silence of the sixteen persons who voted them, and who, if they could have appeared before the committee of this House and given an honest reason for the marking of the votes, would to a man have risen to resent all imputation on their honesty; with the silence of the author of the handwriting on these marked ballots, who, if he could explain his conduct would have been produced and his explanation put in proof—with these circumstances before the House, we have gentlemen who assume to represent here the party of political purity, declaring that these ballots are as good as those cast by the honest, independent, unpurchased, and unpurchasable citizens of this country. [Applause.]

This, then, is the explanation which the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. O'FERRALL] has proposed. This is the position which he must occupy in this contention. This is the determination for which he must argue before this House.

Sir, I would not barter the record of the Democratic party on contested-election cases for fifty seats in this House. I would not for any temporary party advantage barter the record of fairness which was made in the Fiftieth Congress when a Republican was kept in his seat by Democratic votes, rather than any imputation should be placed upon his character.

I would not for any number of seats surrender the advantage we enjoy in contrast with your [turning to the Republican side] conduct in marching down into districts and overturning majorities of 7,000 or 8,000; rushing cases to a conclusion without argument on the floor of this House; trampling on character; attempting even to put an imputation of blood upon the hand of as honest, upright, gentle, pure a man as ever sat within the halls of this representative body. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, when the people of the United States have risen and reduced you to a shattered, shivering remnant outside the breastworks by reason of that record, it is amazing and disheartening to find that a gentleman from the great State of Virginia should think proper to place himself at your head and feel that the leadership of such a troop is a captaincy of which he might be proud, and that he should appeal for support to the Democratic side upon the claim that corruption and bribery are equally upright in the eyes of the law with honesty and patriotism. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, if there were one particle of basis, one shadow of authority, for the assertion that the 28 ballots cast in the city of Elmira for Mr. Rockwell bore any appearance of having been marked for the purpose of bribery, I would be the first to vote for his expulsion from this House. We can not afford to take the position of apologizing for the crime towards the eradication of which all our efforts are pledged, in the denunciation of which we have spent four years before the American people, and concerning which we have succeeded in awakening the consciences of the electorate, as was proved by the results of the elections for the last two years. If the theory advanced here be correct, if these 16 ballots are good and valid ballots, I trust that the door of the White House will be opened to a certain extinguished statesman of Indiana, and that the tardy hospitalities—may I say the deferred welcome—of the past four years will be compensated for by abundant feasting from this to the end of the term. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

I trust that we shall not wipe from our party record the proposition found in the platform adopted by the Democrats of Indiana only yesterday, that the sale of a Cabinet office in return for a corruption fund was a disgrace to the political system of this country. [Applause on the Democratic side.] For what can be more meritorious than the purchase of votes if the doctrine of the gentleman from Michigan is to be held by this House? But, Mr. Speaker, we on this side who speak in defense of Mr. Rockwell's title to his seat speak for it not because he is a Democrat. We speak for it not because he is opposed by the party which has always trained its guns upon honesty in political methods; we speak for it because he was elected by the voice of the unpurchased electorate of his district; we speak for it because upon the report of the majority itself the evidence is overwhelmingly in his favor. And when they seek to impair his right it is by insinuation and not by evidence; it is by statement and not by proof; it is by a charge smuggled into this record and never established by testimony in the committee.

Why, I ask the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. O'FERRALL], why was not the motion to strike out the testimony concerning those 28 ballots either granted or denied? Why did not the committee give Mr. Rockwell some notice that the testimony would be considered a part of the case, so that he might have an opportunity to rebut it? The gentleman from Virginia is a lawyer as well as a statesman and a soldier. It is his chivalry rather than his judgment that has betrayed him into the wrong camp. I do not blame him for the attitude he has taken upon this floor, though I deplore the fact that he should be found in bad company. I do not dispute the right of a Republican to his seat merely because he is a Republican. But when that party comes here with a plea for fair elections, I say it is only just and proper that it should be compelled to bear at the bar where it pleads the odium of the bad character acquired by it in every Congress where it has had control of the Committee on Contested Elections. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I say now to the gentleman from Virginia and to this House, it is not for a Democrat that I plead: it is for the rights of the people of the United States: it is for the purity of the ballot box, not for any one person who claims here the benefit of the votes that were contained in it. I speak for the sanctity of the altar of sovereignty itself, and I say that the seat secured to Mr. Rockwell by a majority of the unpurchased votes of his district is sacred in the eyes of the law, is protected by every letter of our Constitution, and should be defended by every honest impulse of our nature. And I say to the gentleman from Virginia that when the vote of this House shall be counted on this question the majority of his followers will be found amongst those who have not hesitated to steal character, or to try to steal it, when a political outrage was to be accomplished, among those who leveled the power of the law, or sought to level it, against the freedom of elections in his own State; and that if a man is to be judged by the character of the company he keeps, the gentleman from Virginia will need to ask the indulgence of the majority of his associates on the Democratic side of the House.

I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that in speaking for the right of Mr. Rockwell to hold this seat I speak for the purity of elections, for an honest expression of the popular will, for the inviolability of the ballot box. I believe that no partisan advantage would compensate for the loss that would be sustained by any unfair exercise of judicial power in this House. We have seen the effect of the disregard of every principle of justice upon the minority. We have seen to what proportions in this House that powerful party has shrunk. Far be it from me to ask my party associates to follow any course which would bring them to the brink of the same abyss into which the minority were plunged in 1890.

But I appeal to every side of this House to fairly consider the character of these Doyle ballots, and to treat them as the palpable fruits of corruption deserve to be treated. I have a right to appeal to you gentlemen on the Republican side. I have fought side by side with you when the character and the right of one of your own party was assailed by what I conceived to be an unjust report. I hope that when this vote is recorded there will be found some men on this side of the House [the Republican side] to declare their belief that purchased votes can not be considered as the expression of the popular will, and that no title to a seat can be maintained upon a record tainted with bribery, corruption, and fraud, and which seeks to establish itself not by denial of crime, but by an attempt to shelter itself behind a technicality unfairly and improperly injected into the case by the report of the majority. [Loud applause.]

[Mr. O'FERRALL withholds his remarks for revision. See Appendix.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the substitute offered by the minority of the committee is regarded as pending.

Mr. O'FERRALL. I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. Is it understood that the substitute of the minority is pending?

Mr. COBB of Alabama. It is so understood.

Mr. O'FERRALL. Pending the motion for the previous question, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CHIPMAN], who wishes to make a correction.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Virginia withdraw the demand for the previous question?

Mr. O'FERRALL. Yes, sir; for the present.

Mr. CHIPMAN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] misstated entirely the position which I took here yesterday. He represented me as assuming a position entirely ridiculous—making a man of straw and then proceeding to attack him.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I simply want to make a personal explanation.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. I was going to ask whether we shall be entitled to the same time on our side.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama will state his question of order.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I will sit down if the gentleman from Alabama objects to my proceeding. I simply wanted to put myself right on the record.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Without argument?

Mr. CHIPMAN. I do not propose to make any argument.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Then I withdraw my objection.

Mr. CHIPMAN. The gentleman from New York represented me as saying that fraudulent votes could be counted. On the contrary, what I did say was this:

On the contrary, in reference to an act of this kind—the act of voting—when without corrupt motives the voter's ticket may be marked so that another may know whose ticket it is—while if he consents to this, he may be subject to the penalty prescribed by the statute, yet that statute does not pretend, nor can it be made by any construction to mean, to take away from him his franchise as a voter. You can not extend the penalty. That is a familiar principle in all law.

Need I argue it to lawyers? need I argue it to American citizens jealously conscious of what liberty is? You can not add a punishment to the punishment fixed by a statute. You can not say that the man shall be punished by fine and imprisonment because the statute says so, and in addition to that shall be punished by losing his vote, unless he has been guilty of corrupt conduct in connection with it.

I said exactly the reverse of what the gentleman from New York represented me as saying, and if he had listened or read he would have known that such was the case.

Mr. O'FERRALL. I renew the demand for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia demands the previous question upon the resolutions reported by the committee, and upon the substitute submitted by the minority of the committee.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. BRYAN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BRYAN. Would it be in order at this time to make a motion to recommit this contest with instructions that testimony be taken in regard to the 16 Doyle ballots and the 28 marked ballots?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that motion is not in order at this time. The rule provides that a motion to recommit may be made either before or after the previous question is ordered upon the passage of a bill. It has been frequently held by presiding officers that the word "bill" in this case is used as a generic term, applying to and including all legislative propositions which can properly come before the House. So that in this case the House must first dispose of the substitute, which is but an amendment; and after the disposition of that, when the question shall be upon the original resolutions as amended or without amendment, the motion to recommit will be in order.

Mr. BRYAN. Then if we vote down the substitute, we can have the question on the motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The motion to recommit may be made whether the substitute be voted down or not. The Clerk will report the resolutions reported by the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Hosea H. Rockwell was not elected a Representative to the Fifty-second Congress from the Twenty-eighth Congressional district of New York and is not entitled to the seat.

Resolved, That Henry T. Noyes was elected a Representative to the Fifty-second Congress from the Twenty-eighth Congressional district of New York and is entitled to the seat.

The SPEAKER. For these resolutions the minority of the committee have offered a substitute, which will be voted on first. The proposed substitute will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Henry T. Noyes was not elected and is not entitled to a seat in the Fifty-second Congress.

Resolved, That Hosea H. Rockwell was duly elected the Representative to the Fifty-second Congress from the Twenty-eighth district of the State of New York, and is entitled to a seat in said Congress.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon agreeing to the resolutions just read.

Mr. BRYAN. What I desire is that we may have a vote against seating either of the parties to the contest.

The SPEAKER. These resolutions can be divided, if any gentleman demands a separate vote.

Mr. BRYAN. I call for a division.

The SPEAKER. A division is demanded, and the vote will now be taken on the first of the resolutions submitted by the minority, which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Henry T. Noyes was not elected and is not entitled to a seat in the Fifty-second Congress.

Mr. O'FERRALL. Do I understand a separate vote on this resolution is called for?

The SPEAKER. That is the understanding of the Chair.

Mr. BRYAN. I have asked for a division, so that we may vote, if we like, against seating either of the parties to the contest. That is the way I want to vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman to ask for a separate vote on these two resolutions. The first question is upon the first of the resolutions.

Mr. O'FERRALL. On this question I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 140, nays 98, not voting 90; as follows:

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the next resolution as a substitute proposed by the minority of the committee; which the Clerk will now read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Hosea H. Rockwell was duly elected the Representative to the Fifty-second Congress from the Twenty-eighth district of the State of New York, and is entitled to a seat in said Congress.

Mr. O'FERRALL. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The motion is to substitute the resolution just read for the resolution reported by the Committee on Elections, and on that the gentleman from Virginia demands the yeas and nays.

Mr. TRACEY. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TRACEY. If this motion is carried there can be no further motion made respecting this case, can there?

The SPEAKER. Of course the House will have to adopt the resolutions. This is merely substituting the resolutions submitted by the minority of the committee for those reported by the majority of the committee.

Mr. TRACEY. But if this resolution is adopted it declares Mr. Rockwell entitled to his seat as a member.

The SPEAKER. If the resolution is adopted it will be an amendment to the resolution reported from the committee, and the question must then be taken upon the resolution as amended.

Mr. BRYAN. If the substitute is adopted, and when the question is pending on the resolutions as amended, will it be in order to move to recommit this subject to the Committee on Elections with instructions.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so. The question will then be on the adoption of the resolutions as amended.

On the pending question the gentleman from Virginia demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 128, nays 106, not voting 94; as follows:

So the second resolution submitted by the minority of the committee was agreed to.

Mr. HOUK of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state that I was paired with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HARTER] upon this question, but finding that he was paired with the gentleman from New York [Mr. STAHLNECKER] I felt myself at liberty to vote.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The amendment is agreed to. The Clerk will now report the resolution as amended by the House.

Mr. McMILLIN and Mr. BRYAN addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN].

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, pending that, as there is only half an hour remaining until the recess begins, we will not have time to take more than one yea-and-nay vote, and for that reason I ask unanimous consent that the hour for taking the recess be postponed until the determination of the matter.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] asks unanimous consent to postpone the hour at which the House shall take a recess until the evening session until such time as this matter is determined. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now report the resolution as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Henry T. Noyes was not elected, and is not entitled to a seat in the Fifty-second Congress.

Resolved, That Hosea H. Rockwell was duly elected a Representative to the Fifty-second Congress from the Twenty-eighth district of the State of New York, and is entitled to his seat in said Congress.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, I submit the motion which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BRYAN] moves to recommit the case with the following instructions, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

That this election contest be recommended to the Committee on Elections with instructions to take testimony concerning the 16 Doyle ballots cast for Noyes and the 28 marked ballots cast for Rockwell, in order to ascertain the reason for the irregularities which appear, or to allow the parties to do so, and to report to the House as soon as convenient the testimony and the recommendation.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] that his motion is not in order.

Mr. BYRAN. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. OTIS. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. BYRAN. I demand the previous question.

Mr. OTIS. I ask to amend that motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BRYAN] demands the previous question upon his motion. If that is voted down, then the amendment will be in order. Then, if it is sustained, the amendment will not be in order. The question is upon the demand for the previous question upon the motion to recommit with instructions.

Mr. CARUTH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky will state it.

Mr. CARUTH. The House having voted that Mr. Noyes was not elected a Representative from the Twenty-eighth Congressional district of the State of New York, on a yea-and-nay vote, and then, on a yea-and-nay vote, having voted that Mr. Rockwell was elected a member and that he is entitled to his seat, my parliamentary inquiry is, would it not be an absurdity to say that we could now recommit this matter to the committee?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Kentucky that this case stands exactly as a bill would stand before the House. If a bill were reported here carrying an appropriation of $5,000, and if the House should amend it by inserting "$100,000" in place of "$5,000," then the bill as amended would still have to be voted upon in order to pass it.

Mr. CARUTH. But I wish to suggest to the Speaker that the difference is that we have already passed this bill.

The SPEAKER. That is not a parliamentary inquiry. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BRYAN] demands the previous question upon the motion to recommit with the instructions submitted by him.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question now is upon the motion to recommit with instructions.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, is it not in order now to move to lay that on the table?

Mr. SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. O'FERRALL. Mr. Speaker, on the motion of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BRYAN] let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. OTIS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] to the fact that in the first session of the Forty-ninth Congress it was held that a motion to lay on the table a motion to recommit a bill, with or without instructions, is not in order.

Mr. OTIS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. OTIS. I desire to offer an amendment to the recommendation—

The SPEAKER. The previous question having been ordered, the motion is not amendable. The question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BRYAN].

Mr. O'FERRALL. And upon that I ask the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 110, nays 124, not voting 94; as follows:

The SPEAKER. On this question the yeas are 110, the nays 124; so the House refuses to recommit with instructions; and the question now is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The question was taken, and the resolution as amended was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. COBB of Alabama, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

APPOINTMENT OF CONFEREES.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces as conferees on the bill (H. R. 5681) for control of and to promote the safety of national banks Mr. BACON of New York, Mr. Cox of Tennessee, and Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows: To Mr. PENDLETON, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. WRIGHT, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. COOMBS, for five days, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. OUTHWAITE, for the rest of the day, on account of illness.

The SPEAKER. The hour of 5 o'clock having arrived, the Chair declares the House in recess until 8 o'clock, and designates the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] to preside at the evening session.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House was called to order at 8 o'clock by Mr. RICHARDSON, as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. MARTIN. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of bills on the private Calendar.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Speaker, I want a count; I wish to know how many are here.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 30, noes 4.

Mr. KILGORE. What was the count?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The ayes are 30, and the noes 4.

Mr. KILGORE. I fear the Speaker's count was not accurate. I do not think there are more than twelve here. I make the point of order that we ought to have more members present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILGORE] makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will appoint the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILGORE] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MARTIN] as tellers.

The House again divided; and tellers reported—ayes 40, nays none.

So the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. DOCKERY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole under the special order, and the Clerk will report the first bill.

LUCY HASKELL.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5602) granting a pension to Lucy Haskell, mother, by adoption, of John Haskell.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Lucy Haskell, mother, by adoption, of John Haskell, late of Company G, One hundred and sixth regiment New York Volunteers, to date from the approval of this act.

The committee recommended that the bill be amended by inserting at the end of the bill the words "at the rate of $12 per month."

The report, which has already appeared in the RECORD, was read.

Mr. MEREDITH. Mr. Chairman, I want to inquire if this is not the same old lady who was here last Friday night.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state, in reply to the question of the gentleman from Virginia, that this bill was under consideration when the committee rose on last Friday evening.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Chairman, this is the bill that was before the House last Friday night, and some were anxious to know whether or not these people are dependent—the father and mother; whether this child ought to have treated these people as parents, and whether or not, in the case of the return of the woman who was the natural mother of this child, she could have taken the place of the adopted parent. This young man Allen was given to Mr. Haskell and wife when he was but a few months old—a year and upward.

They raised him as their own child. At that time they had no children. They educated him as well as they were able. Before entering the service he labored for them, when in the service he sent them money, and at his death they mourned him as a child of their own. Their three other children, to whom reference has been made and respecting whom some information is desired, were born subsequent to the adoption of this child by the Has-kells. One of those three died.

Another one, a daughter, went west and is living in very moderate circumstances, without any ability to render aid to her parents. The other, a son, is unable to contribute to the support of others and is scarcely able to take care of himself. The parents are without means. Their entire income will amount to but very few dollars a year. They have a little house in a small hamlet which would be worth but a very small sum of money if offered for sale, and the income from it, if rented, would probably not exceed $50 a year.

Ever since the war the country has recognized this class of claims as just and proper, and at every session of Congress pensions of this kind have been granted. It may be asked why a general law is not passed to provide for such cases, and it can be said in answer that it is better to leave the few cases of this character that there are in the country to make known their claims and let Congress decide upon each one separately, because were they to be covered by a general law it would in all probability be so elastic as to let in many who would not be justly entitled to benefit by it. I do not believe there is any question now in the mind of any gentleman present regarding the merits of this bill in view of the laws of like character which we have heretofore passed and the principle upon which those laws were passed. If there is any special information desired respecting this case, I should be glad to give it so far as I am able.

Mr. KILGORE. Who prepared this report?

Mr. CURTIS. The gentleman from New York who has the pleasure of addressing his friend from Texas prepared the report.

Mr. KILGORE. Then the gentleman from New York unfortunately prepared a very meager report. There is not anything in that report which would indicate that these people are needy. There is not anything in that report nor in the statement made by the gentleman from New York in the presence of this fragment of the House to indicate that they relied at all upon this adopted child for help or that he ever contributed to their support.

Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey. The gentleman from New York distinctly said that he did.

Mr. KILGORE. There is not anything in that report, if I remember it correctly, to indicate that this lady is in straitened circumstances except the general statement that she is poor. I believe that statement does appear. Besides, the report does not say that she is married. It does not refer to the fact that she has children living, and this committee never obtained any information upon that point until this evening from the statements made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CURTIS] supplementing the report. Now, I do not want to reflect on the Committee on Invalid Pensions, nor to reflect on the gentlemen writing reports upon these pension cases, but I do think it is due to the House in these cases that all the facts and circumstances relating to every material question involved in the case should be stated in the report, so that the House may draw its own conclusions as to the merits. Besides, the general statement is made in that report that the mother of this child is not known to these people and that her whereabouts is unknown.

This was a natural child taken by these people and raised to manhood, when he enlisted in the Army. Now, it is legitimate to assume that the mother of this child is living and that she is drawing a pension by reason of the fact that he lost his life in the war. How are we to determine? The report is silent on that point. No investigation has been given to that feature in the case.

Mr. CURTIS. Will the gentleman give way for a piece of information?

Mr. KILGORE. I will hear any inquiry that the gentleman wants to propound to me.

Mr. CURTIS. I was going to answer some statements that you were making without sufficient knowledge of the facts.

Mr. KILGORE. I would like to be corrected if I am making an incorrect statement.

Mr. CURTIS. I have not the slightest doubt of that. This report does state that these people accepted this child and adopted him as their own, and that they had also three children of their own. It does state that the actual mother of this child went away and has been gone for forty years without any information in regard to her being had in that community; it states also that the adopted mother, in whose behalf this bill is introduced, is 72 years old and that the father is still older. The report gives a great deal of the information to which reference has been made by my friend from Texas [Mr. KILGORE], though not all that he desires.

Additional information has been given by the gentleman who introduced the bill. He has stated to the House his information on these several points, and will now say again that Mr. Haskell is 74 years of age; Mrs. Haskell, 72. They are poor people; they raised this child, and he made return to them before going to the Army, by rendering such service as he could, and after entering the Army by contributing from his funds. They did really depend upon him.

Mr. KILGORE. Is that matter stated in the report—that they relied upon this child for support?

Mr. CURTIS. Not to the extent I am stating it now; but I am satisfied that when it is now communicated to the House, even my friend from Texas will not dispute the origin or correctness of the statement.

Mr. KILGORE. I assume the gentleman is making a statement of facts which have come to his knowledge; but I do not know anything about the source of his knowledge.

Mr. CURTIS. It is obtained from credible people in the town where this lady lives.

Mr. KILGORE. The information may be derived perhaps from some attorney in this city; some claim agent or pension agent may have told the gentleman about it, or the friends of these people may have posted him. I am not disputing that the gentleman tells the truth so far as he knows it. I would not undertake to do that. I would not do it if I were a much smaller man than he is. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAVIS. You are very cautious.

Mr. CURTIS. I recognize my friend's discretion. [Laughter.]

Mr. KILGORE. Now, Mr. Chairman, the principal foundation for this claim is that these people are old and that they are poor.

A MEMBER. Is not that enough?

Mr. KILGORE. Well, there are possibly ten million people in this country who are honest and poor and old.

A MEMBER. Why not give them all pensions?

Mr. KILGORE. That seems to be the idea. That was the idea of some of our friends here in the last Congress. Now, I do not think this case is a proper subject for special legislation. I do not think these people have earned the bounty of the Government. I do not think that anybody to whom they had the right to look for support has earned it in their behalf, and if this is so, the fact that these people are poor and old amounts to nothing; it can not be considered in this connection. My benevolent friend from New York has had his sympathies aroused in behalf of these people; that is perfectly natural, and I sympathize with them too. But then there is a duty upon us which I insist we ought to perform, each man according to his own convictions.

Mr. SCOTT. Will you allow me a question?

Mr. KILGORE. Certainly.

Mr. SCOTT. I knew you would. I wish to ask whether you do not consider that this case is as meritorious and comes as much within the spirit of the law as if this soldier had been the son of these people in fact as well as by adoption?

Mr. KILGORE. Well, I do not; if I did I would not make this opposition to the bill. And if such were the case, then the mother could go to the Pension Office and secure a pension. Under the general law these people, as the case now stands, are excluded.

Mr. CURTIS. My friend will permit me to say that at the Pension Office no person can receive a pension by reason of the military service of any individual unless that service is established; and no two persons ever receive a pension on account of the same service except in the case of widows with children under 16 years of age; and they must be specially designated.

Now if this woman should apply at the Pension Office for a pension she would be obliged to show her connection or relationship to this child, and the proof must be furnished, which can not be done; and if she could do so, any pension that might have been granted to any other person on account of the services of this soldier would cease.

Mr. KILGORE. The law, then, is against the granting of this pension in the Pension Office.

Mr. CURTIS. Of course it is, because the natural mother is not known and has no claim.

Mr. KILGORE. I wish to say—and this is a part of my answer to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SCOTT]—that if the applicant in this case had been dependent upon this adopted child, if these people had raised him, had been dependent upon the fruits of his labor, and had no other child, then I would not make any question about this case, because it would approach so near to the requirements of the general law that I could not consistently make objection.

Mr. CURTIS. But these children of their own have rendered them no service; can not do so. One is dead, the other is resident a great distance from the home of her parents, and has no means of contributing to their support.

Mr. KILGORE. That is not stated in the report.

Mr. CURTIS. No, but that is the statement I make now for the information of my friend, who wants this pension to go through if he is satisfied there is merit in it. I accept the statement he has so frequently offered in this House; this is a question of merit with him.

But now I hope I have satisfied my good friend from Texas of the absolute dependence of these people upon this child; and in his absence the Government should render this aid, since my friend has conceded that it would be but an act of truth and justice in such cases.

Mr. KILGORE. Now, do I understand that the law—and I am not familiar with the law on this subject and that is why I ask the question—would give the mother a pension if this had been her own son?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KILGORE. She at the same time having a living husband?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KILGORE. Then what are you going to do with the father? Is he overlooked?

Mr. CURTIS. He is overlooked and is number 2, the widow being number 1. The Government have recognized in this matter, my friend from Texas must recollect, that the granting of a pension to the mother under such circumstances is the first step in the payment of the indebtedness of the Government to its disabled soldiers.

Mr. KILGORE. But suppose they had another son, and he had gone into the war, say at a later period, and had been killed, would his father get a pension on account of his loss?

Mr. CURTIS. No, sir; the Government grants but one pension under such circumstances in a family.

Mr. KILGORE. Would not the mother get another increase by reason of it?

Mr. CURTIS. No, sir.

Mr. KILGORE. Oh, you will be here asking for that. [Laughter.]

Mr. CURTIS. Oh, no; the committee have rejected just such cases.

Mr. KILGORE. I have not heard of a case like this since I have been here. In fact there is no evidence of the legal adoption of this child, at least I do not know of any, and although I do not think I will be likely to stickle on that question, yet it takes a process of law for people to adopt a child, as my friend knows.

Mr. CURTIS. I recognize that.

Mr. KILGORE. And there is no statement in the report of my friend from New York that there was any legal process employed in the adoption of this child. On the contrary, it is a case where the mother seems to have been adopted. Now, it seems to me that it would be better to let this lie over for awhile and let us look a little further into it.

Mr. CURTIS. I have stated that this child was adopted by these people.

Mr. KILGORE. According to law?

Mr. CURTIS. According to law.

Mr. KILGORE. What evidence has the gentleman of that fact?

Mr. CURTIS. I am informed by a neighbor who is without interest in the case that this child was regularly adopted. Now, I have not seen the papers, but I assume that so far as the law required compliance it has been complied with, and every circumstance connected with it indicates that he was actually and regularly adopted. I may state that the final settlement of the soldier when made, on his death, was reported to his people and paid to them, so that a recognition by the Government of his relation to these people has been already made establishing the fact that he was regarded as their child. The settlement of the amount due him at the time of his death would not have been made with his family if there had been any doubt of that fact.

Mr. KILGORE. If a lawyer had written to you and told you that this child was adopted by these people you would know what it meant, but if it was a layman or nonprofessional person who wrote you, knowing nothing of the meaning of the word "adoption," or the provisions of the law in regard to it, then he would probably use the term in the common acceptance of the word in the community, when a family takes charge of a child, for instance, and raises it. I think we had better let this stand over until we get more information upon it.

Mr. PAYNE. If these people had taken the child as an infant and brought it up and treated it as they would a natural child of their own, does it not follow that the child should render some service? Of course when the child grew up it ought to render service in return to these foster parents for their care.

Mr. KILGORE. How old was the boy when he went to the war?

Mr. CURTIS. He was about 20 years.

Mr. KILGORE. I am much inclined—

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, you are inclined to let it go through. [Laughter.]

Mr. CURTIS. Let it go before the House on its third reading and I will answer the gentleman any question he wants answered.

Mr. KILGORE. Well, you overpersuade me. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment recommended by the committee was adopted, and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

DAVID L. TRUAX.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2902) for the relief of David L. Truax.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to David L. Truax, dependent son of John Truax, late a private in Company D, Eighty-second Indiana Volunteers, the pension of $18 per month heretofore made payable to his guardian, said payments to include all sums accrued and accruing by reason of the act of August 19, 1890, for his relief.

Mr. KILGORE. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. MARTIN) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2902) for the relief of David L. Truax, have had the same under consideration and now submit the following report:

On the 19th day of August, 1890, a bill for the relief of the claimant was passed by Congress providing for the payment to him "through his legally constituted guardian at the rate of $18 per month." The committee making the report said:

"The proposed beneficiary is the imbecile son of John Truax, deceased, late private in Company D, Eighty-second Regiment Indiana Volunteers. The father's death was the result of his service, and occurred while in the service at Murfreesboro, Tenn., of fever. The son was pensioned under the general law until he arrived at the age of 16 years. He is a helpless cripple and a weak-minded person, the result of a spell of fever; is wholly incapacitated for mental or physical labor, and is a charge upon his brothers and sisters who are all poor people. His mother is dead and no other person is drawing a pension on account of this soldier's death."

The laws of Indiana in such cases made and provided are such that before a guardian can be appointed, a jury must determine upon examination of competent witnesses that the person named is of unsound mind to such an extent as to require the appointment of a guardian. In the case of this beneficiary, whose legal residence is in the State of Indiana, a jury investigated his sanity and decided that he was not insane or sufficiently imbecile to warrant the appointment of a guardian. The Commissioner of Pensions being informed of this action declined to pay the amount of said pension to the claimant herein or to any other person except his legally constituted guardian, and adds:

"This Bureau is powerless to act in the matter, and until a guardian has been duly appointed to represent this claimant or legislative action removes this barrier, the claim must remain in status quo."

The claimant being permanently disabled and in pressing need of the relief granted him by the act of Congress referred to, the committee submit a favorable report and recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of this bill a question. Is the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions in charge of it?

Mr. MARTIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. I understand the report to say that the jury in the State where the beneficiary resides find that he is not an imbecile; that he is not a lunatic. I do not see why he could not earn his own living.

Mr. MARTIN. Because he is permanently disabled. He is a helpless cripple.

Mr. BAILEY. Then let me ask the gentleman from Indiana if it is true that Indiana has made no provision for the support of her helpless cripples? Does she expect the Federal Government to take care of them all?

Mr. MARTIN. Where the child, as in this case, has been deprived of his natural support because of the death of his father, who was in the Union Army, dying in the service, of a fever contracted while there, in such a case, as between the State and the United States, it seems to me clear that the United States ought to provide for him rather than the State of Indiana.

Mr. BAILEY. That is not exactly my question. I asked the gentleman if Indiana made no provision for cases of this kind?

Mr. MARTIN. Yes, I believe there are provisions. Whether they will touch this particular case I can not say. Mr. Chairman, with the permission of the gentleman, I want to call his attention to this fact: This is simply for the purpose of enabling this beneficiary to obtain the benefit of an act passed by the last Congress, giving to him the amount specified in this bill. The trouble is simply this: that act requires the payment to be made not to him but to his guardian. Being of the age that he is, a guardian could not be appointed for him unless a jury of that State should, under the law, find that he was so unsound of mind as to be incapable of managing his own estate.

Upon the trial of that matter, after the law had been passed by Congress in 1890, the jury found that he was not a person of unsound mind within the meaning of the statute of that State. But I want to call your attention to this fact: Under the act of June 27, 1890, had the child been at the time of the passage of the act under the age of 16, then on account of his being a helpless cripple he would have been entitled to a pension under that general law. But because he was over the age of 16 when that law went into effect, the ruling of the Department cuts him out, and therefore it is necessary, in order that he may obtain this relief, to apply to Congress for the passage of this special bill.

Mr. BAILEY. But, as I understand the case, either the Federal Government or the State of Indiana must take care of this cripple?

Mr. MARTIN. Yes.

Mr. BAILEY. Well, it seems to me that, he being a citizen of the State of Indiana and his father before him having resided there, the State of Indiana, like all the other States of this Union, ought to make provision for this case.

Mr. PAYNE. May I make one suggestion? If that rule was enforced no person in the country who happened to be a proper subject for the pauper laws could be pensioner, because every State takes care of its paupers; and if a person who would be entitled to a pension otherwise was a pauper, under the definition of the gentleman from Texas, the Federal Government could not give any pension if that idea were to be carried out.

Mr. BAILEY. Well, certainly the Federal Government, by its laws, has not recognized this to be a proper case for a pension, because you have to come in here to get a special act passed.

Mr. SCOTT. Let me suggest to the gentleman that, as I understand, there is already a special act granting a pension to this person, to be paid to his guardian; but owing to his mental condition he can not have a guardian appointed.

Mr. BAILEY. Then, as I understand, it is simply a question as to whom the payment shall be made?

Mr. SCOTT. That is the point exactly. That is all there is to it.

Mr. BAILEY. Well, then, I have no objection to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon laying aside the bill with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Chairman, I understand that there is a law in force now authorizing the payment to this beneficiary of the sum of $18 a month. Is that so?

Mr. MARTIN. No, not to him, but to his guardian, and he can have no guardian appointed.

Mr. KILGORE. Well, now, you are enacting another law. The original act provides that it shall be paid to his guardian, but it so turned out that he could not have a guardian appointed under the Indiana law, as I understand it. Now, does this bill propose to amend that law and direct the payment of the pension to the beneficiary himself?

Mr. MARTIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KILGORE. I understand it to be an act authorizing the putting of his name on the pension roll and paying him $18 a month.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will allow me—

Mr. KILGORE. Does it change the amount provided?

Mr. MARTIN. No; the only change is to direct the money to be paid to him instead of to his guardian.

Mr. KILGORE. This is, then, an amendment to the original act?

Mr. MARTIN. That far it is; but let me suggest that this very bill, now before this committee for consideration, refers to and is based upon the act passed by the last Congress.

Mr. KILGORE. Then it was so?

Mr. MARTIN. It is the act of 1890. I am reading from the bill.

Mr. KILGORE. All I wanted to arrive at was that we should not duplicate this law, and have it so that the guardian sometime in the future could draw $18 for him, and he draw $18 on his own account.

Mr. COOPER. I want to say to the gentleman that this case is mine. He is a constituent of mine, and the effect of this bill is simply to enable the beneficiary to draw a pension which has heretofore been granted to him by act of the last Congress.

Mr. BAILEY. It does not increase the pension.

Mr. COOPER. It does not increase it. It does not increase the charge upon the Government. It only changes his relation.

Mr. SCOTT. It simply directs to whom it shall be paid.

Mr. COOPER. That is all. Heretofore the pension was granted and was to have been paid to a guardian, but by a jury he has been declared to have more sense than would require him to be deprived of the right to control the pension, and we seek to give it to him.

Mr. BAILEY. In other words, it has been proven that he was more helpless when he was applying for a pension than when he wanted to get a guardian.

Mr. COOPER. That is right.

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a few remarks on this case. If that is true, the last Congress was imposed upon. The rule of the committee for several years has been that where a child was imbecile and required a guardian, the amount was fixed at $18 a month, and if he was not in that condition, then it was fixed at a much less sum, generally at $12 a month.

So that if this be the case, there is some objection to this bill in its present form; and I think that the amount of the pension granted in the bill ought to be reduced. It was passed in the last Congress on the assumption that the beneficiary was an imbecile, and the proof was that he was insane.

Mr. SCOTT. He has gotten better since.

Mr. LANE. There is no evidence that he has ever gotten better. It was fixed at $18 a month on the assumption that he would require a guardian, and the bill fixes it at that sum because a part of the amount would be required to pay the fees of the guardian. I submit that it is not proper, if this beneficiary is not an imbecile, that he should have more than other children under like circumstances, and the amount ought to be reduced, in justice to others, to the usual amount in such cases.

Mr. COOPER. In answer to that, Mr. Chairman, the proof before the committee during the last Congress showed that the beneficiary was a person of weak mind. The fact about it was that he had a spell of fever when he was a child, and he failed to develop physically and mentally. He was not insane, and has never been insane according to the definition of insanity by the statute law of Indiana; but he is a person who lacks that vigor of mind and strength and grasp of intellect that well-developed persons have. He is not capable of making his living, and yet he is not insane. That is the situation of the case.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

MARY JEWETT TELFORD.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5021) granting a pension to Mary Jewett Telford, an army nurse.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension rolls the name of Mary Jewett Telford (formerly Mary Jewett), now a resident of Denver, Colo., at the rate of $50 per month, on account of disability resulting from disease contracted while serving as a hospital nurse during the war of the rebellion.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read as follows:

In line 6 strike out "fifty" and insert "twelve."

The report (by Mr. JOLLEY) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5021) granting a pension to Mary Jewett Telford, submit the following report:

By affidavits and original commission and discharge it appears that Mary Jewett Telford performed services as nurse in hospital No. 8, Nashville, Tenn., and after serving as nurse for some time she was, on November 28, 1863, commissioned as nurse by James E. Yeatman, president Western Sanitary Commission at St. Louis, Mo. Her services as nurse was rendered under the name of Mary Jewett.

She was discharged from her service as nurse on June 6, 1864, and returned to her home in Lima, Washtenaw County, Mich. Nearly all the time she served as nurse she was the only woman in hospital No. 8, Nashville, Tenn., and in said hospital there were 600 beds, kept well filled, and that she visited each of the seven wards every day.

In said hospital there were long flights of stairs without elevators. Her severe work in said hospital brought on spinal difficulty and nervous fever, which compelled her to withdraw from the service as nurse, and from which she has suffered since she left the service in June, 1864, and from which she is suffering now. Her grand services as nurse is fully established by affidavits and letters. She suffered from these physical disabilities and diseases from the time she left the service until the present time.

That these diseases caused her to leave the service is fully established by affidavits. She was a healthy woman when she commenced her services as nurse, and she has not been healthy since that time. She is totally incapacitated for mental toil and is able to perform but little physical labor.

She was married to Jacob Telford July 3, 1864, at Lima, Washtenaw County, Mich., and her husband is living at the present time and is receiving a pension of $8 per month for a gunshot wound through the groin at Stone River, Tennessee, on December 30, 1862, while he was a member of Company B, Fifth Indiana Infantry.

The family of Mary Jewett Telford consists of her husband and three orphan girls adopted by her. Her husband has been ever since he was discharged from the military service of the United States subject to prolonged attacks of inflammatory rheumatism in its worst type, and has been in consequence unable to support his family for many years, and Mary Jewett Telford and her husband have no home, land, stock, capital, or financial dependence of any sort except Mr. Telford's pension.

Your committee recommend that the bill be amended by striking out the word "fifty," in 6 of the bill, and by inserting in lieu thereof the word "twelve," and, as thus amended, your committee recommend that the bill do pass.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Chairman, I was interrupted during the reading of the report, and did not find out how long this lady served as a nurse. Is there any gentleman present who knows about this bill?

Mr. JOLLEY. She went into the service in November 1863, and served until June 6, 1864.

Mr. KILGORE. Is she a married woman?

Mr. JOLLEY. She was not then, but she is now.

Mr. KILGORE. She is now?

Mr. JOLLEY. Yes, sir. Her husband draws a pension of $8 a month. They have no land, or property of any kind, and just live off their pension.

Mr. KILGORE. Was she a married woman when she served as nurse?

Mr. JOLLEY. No, sir; she was not.

Mr. KILGORE. I would like to inquire for information whether they keep a roll of the army nurses so as to be able to verify their service?

Mr. BUTLER. She had a regular commission.

Mr. JOLLEY. She had a commission.

Mr. KILGORE. In the service?

Mr. McKINNEY. All these cases are referred by us to the War Department, and we get our authority from that Department.

Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey. The committee does attend to its business then?

Mr. KILGORE. Better let it go? [Cries of "Let it go!"] [Great laughter.]

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to. The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a recommendation that it do pass.

LAURA E. SKEELS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was a bill (H. R. 1742) for the relief of Mrs. Laura E. Skeels.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be paid to Mrs. Laura E. Skeels the pension and arrearages which were due her mother, Mrs. Nancy M. Elmendorf, under pension certificate 189143.

The report (by Mr. SNOW) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1742) granting a payment of accrued pension to Laura E. Skeels, submit the following report:

Alexander F. Elmendorf enlisted August 21, 1831, in Company K, Second New York Cavalry, and died in service December 9, 1864. In July, 1880, a pension certificate numbered 189143 was issued to allow pension to his dependent mother, Nancy M. Elmendorf, at the rate of $8 per month from December 10, 1864. Prior to the issuance of this certificate, however, the mother for whose benefit it was issued had died, on January 9, 1880, and hence no part of this pension was ever paid to her, and the entire amount reverted to the United States Treasury, except a certain sum stated at $206.21, which was paid under section 4718, Revised Statutes, to reimburse the persons who bore the expenses of the last illness and funeral of the decedent.

The object of this bill is to permit the payment to Mrs. Laura E. Skeels, the daughter of Mrs. Elmendorf, the dependent mother above named, the amount of accrued pension which would have been due the mother up to January 9, 1880, if she had lived to receive her certificate, less the amount paid from such accrued pension as reimbursement for funeral expenses, and the amount involved is, in round numbers, about $1,240, which sum was legally due under the pension laws, but which can not now be paid because of the death of the beneficiary.

It appears from evidence submitted that the soldier's mother left two daughters, Mrs. Laura E. Skeels and Emily S. Elmendorf, who still survive. The latter waives all right, title, and interest in the accrued pension of her mother and all right to make claim or petition for the same, and testifies under oath that her sister, Laura E. Skeels, had the entire care and alone contributed to the support of their mother until her death. Mrs. Skeels also testifies that she alone had the care of her mother, who repeatedly stated that it was her desire and wish that she, Mrs. Skeels, should receive the pension due her to reimburse her for expense incurred in taking care of the mother during her life.

It appears from the papers on file in the Pension Office that Mrs. Skeels is the sister of the soldier as claimed, and it is also shown that she is entirely dependent on her own exertions for a living.

Your committee therefore return the bill with the recommendation that it do pass after being amended by adding after line 7 the words "after deducting the amount already paid under section 4718, Revised Statutes, as reimbursement for funeral expenses;" also by inserting the word "accrued" before the word "pension" and striking out the words "and arrearages" in line 5; also, by striking out the word "were," in line 5, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "was."

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that we have no jurisdiction of that bill. It is not a pension bill; it is a claim for a lump sum of money.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. DOCKERY). The Clerk will report clause 3 of Rule XXVI.

The Clerk read as follows:

3. The House shall on each Friday, at 5 o'clock p. m., take a recess until 8 o'clock, which evening session shall be devoted to the consideration of private bills reported from the Committee on Pensions, and the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to bills for the removal of political disabilities, and bills removing charges of desertion only; such evening session not to extend beyond 10 o'clock and 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the point of order made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LANE] is well taken. This bill seems to be in the nature of a claim.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I rose to say a word upon that point before the ruling, but perhaps the Chair will hear it now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. BUTLER. As I understand the rule, it provides for the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and the Committee on Invalid Pensions reported this bill. Whether that committee ought to have had jurisdiction of the bill or not is not the question here. When the bill was so referred without objection that gave the committee jurisdiction, and when the bill is reported, it is a bill reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and therefore, in my judgment, comes under the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The phraseology of the rule as reported by the Clerk is somewhat different from that of the rule which obtained in the last Congress.

Mr. HULL. One word, Mr. Chairman, before the Chair decides this question finally. This is a bill for the disposition of an accrued pension. It is not in the nature of an ordinary claim; it is a pension claim purely.

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly it is a pension claim, but still it is a claim.

Mr. HULL. It simply provides for the disposition of an accrued pension.

The CHAIRMAN. But in the opinion of the Chair that does not alter the fact that it is in the nature of a claim.

Mr. BUTLER. I should like to hear the rule read again.

Paragraph 3 of Rule XXVI was again read as above.

The CHAIRMAN. Paragraph 2 of Rule XXVI of the last House provided for the consideration of "private pension bills."

The rule of the present House would seem to warrant the consideration of any "private bill" reported from the Committee on Pensions or from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, but the Chair thinks it was clearly the intention of the House to limit the business of these Friday evening sessions to bills granting pensions reported from these two committees.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the question directly: Is not this a private bill reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. BUTLER. And does not the rule provide for "private bills" reported from that committee?

The CHAIRMAN. It does; and under a construction strictly technical this bill would be in order; but the uniform practice, so far as the present occupant of the chair is advised—and he has attended these evening sessions for nearly ten years—has been to limit the business of such sessions to the consideration of pension bills reported by the Committee on Pensions or the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. MARTIN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LANE] having withdrawn his point of order, I ask unanimous consent that in the absence of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. NEWBERRY], who introduced this bill, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SNOW], the member of the Committee on Invalid Pensions who reported it, the further consideration of the bill be deferred.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not understand the gentleman from Illinois to withdraw the point of order.

Mr. LANE. No, I did not; but I will if the gentleman wishes to have the bill laid over.

Mr. MARTIN. If there be no objection, I ask that the bill be passed over without any prejudice.

Mr. KILGORE. I think that the Chair ought to rule on this question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has ruled on the question.

Mr. KILGORE. Well, then, that is the end of it.

Mr. MARTIN. I ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LANE], in view of the absence of the two members who are intimately connected with this bill, to withdraw his point of order for the present.

Mr. LANE. I will do so if the bill is to be laid over for the evening.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdraws the point of order; and if there be no objection the bill will be laid aside without prejudice. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

The Clerk proceeded to read the next bill on the Calendar.

Mr. KILGORE. Before we leave the case just now under consideration I want to have a motion put on record—

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that that bill has already been passed over; no objection was made.

Mr. KILGORE. I want to raise this question of order—

Several MEMBERS. Too late!

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Texas that the order with regard to passing the bill over was made without objection, and the Clerk was proceeding to read the next bill.

Mr. KILGORE. The only reason I wanted to make the point now was that I did not wish to have it regarded as waived.

MRS. JENNY Y. WADE.

The next business in order was the bill (H. R. 2073) granting a pension to Mrs. Jenny Y. Wade.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be placed on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Jennie Y. Wade, widow of Alfred B. Wade, late colonel of the Seventy-third Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry.

The report (by Mr. MARTIN) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2073) granting a pension to Mrs. Jennie Y. Wade, submit the following report:

The claimant herein is the widow of Alfred B. Wade, who was lieutenant-colonel of the Seventy-third Indiana Infantry. The records of the War Department show that the soldier was enrolled August 27, 1862, and honorably discharged July 1, 1865. There is no record of any disability while in the United States service. The soldier was drowned February 27, 1877, never having applied for a pension, and the widow filed her application May 4, 1883, alleging that her husband contracted chronic diarrhea in the United States service, which resulted in vertigo, and while suffering therefrom he fell out of a boat and was drowned. The claim was rejected July 19, 1891, on the ground that the evidence adduced by special examination of the claim failed to connect the soldier's death with any disability contracted in the United States service.

W. E. Gorsuch, Henry C. Morgan, and James R. Eaton, comrades, and Surgeons Charles H. Applegate and Seth F. Myers testify that the soldier contracted chronic diarrhea in the service. A number of witnesses testify that the soldier suffered from vertigo from 1868 to date of his death. One witness testifies also that the soldier suffered from vertigo while he was in the Army, and the existence of this trouble within a short period of his discharge is proved beyond a reasonable doubt. The claim is made that the vertigo was due to the diarrhea. The soldier's death was caused by drowning in the Kankakee River, Indiana, falling overboard from his boat while hunting on that river, and it is claimed that his fall was due to vertigo. There was an intimation shortly after his death that he might have committed suicide, but this theory was not entertained and was abandoned. From a lengthy notice of his death in the South Bend Tribune, March 3, 1877, the following theory of his drowning was advanced, and was borne out by all the surrounding circumstances:

"He was seated in one end of his boat eating his dinner and steering the boat with an oar held under his arm. While thus engaged he was seized with one of his dizzy spells, which had troubled him much of late, and falling to one side, careened the boat sufficiently to throw him out in the river; that the water revived him, and he struck out for shore, but failed to reach it, though being an excellent swimmer, on account of the icy coldness of the water, chilling him into a state of numbness. The end of the boat being filled with water, his hat lying in the opposite end, the dinner pail open, gloves off, and one oar missing, all of which goes to show this theory is the true one."

The following extract from a letter to the Commissioner of Pensions, written by Clement Studebaker, of South Bend, a man of the very highest standing and of unimpeachable veracity, effectually wipes out the theory that the soldier committed suicide:

"Mrs. Wade has pension papers awaiting your approval, as I understand it, and I am told that there is some hitch in passing upon them by reason of reports circulated to the effect that Col. Wade's death was due to suicide. This report has never had any foundation in fact, and has never for a moment been credited by those who best knew Col. Wade in life. The exact facts respecting his death must be more or less a mystery, but that its cause was vertigo, to which malady I well knew that Col. Wade was seriously subject, there is every reason to believe."

"I knew Col. Wade intimately and have never doubted that one of these attacks was the cause of his death. I am also knowing to the fact that this was the belief of Mr. Colfax, who was himself subject to them and well knew their prostrating and dangerous effects from experience, dying, as you are aware, himself finally from vertigo, or some of its phases. Nothing but the wildest improbability could form the basis of a story to the effect that Col. Wade took his own life. He had apparently everything to live for, nothing to make him wish to hasten his end. He was a gallant soldier and an honorable, high-minded citizen."

John Stillwell, special examiner, in his report states:
"There can be no doubt but what Col. Wade had vertigo and dizziness in the service. There is no fact to the contrary. I am of the opinion that the soldier had vertigo in the service and that it was of service origin, and that he died from having a spell of vertigo and falling in the water, and being unconscious, was drowned. The case is a meritorious one and should be admitted."

John W. Clappett, special examiner, who examined all the witnesses at South Bend, in his report says:

"After a very careful and as thorough examination as the nature of the claim would permit, following closely the suggestions contained in accompanying slip of reviewer, I am of the opinion that the claim is meritorious and that the soldier died from the results of disease contracted in line of duty in United States military service. It is in evidence that the soldier suffered greatly from chronic diarrhea, which so enfeebled his system that vertigo ensued, beginning about one year after discharge and increasing in severity until death by drowning in February, 1877."

"Three reputable physicians declare the vertigo to have been the result of chronic diarrhea. One witness, James H. Eaton, states under oath that he saw the soldier suffer from a slight attack of vertigo while still in the service, and locates the place to have been Nashville, and the time just prior to starting on the 'Straight raid.' On this raid the soldier, then adjutant of his regiment, was captured, and remained in Libby Prison for ten months before exchange. After exchange he was promoted successively to major, lieutenant-colonel, and colonel of his regiment, although it does not appear that he was ever mustered as colonel. It is in evidence that he suffered continuously with vertigo and that he had a slight attack on the Sunday before his hunting trip, and a severer one a short time previous; also that he complained of vertigo to Dr. Brown at the river edge before putting off to his boat and was urged by Dr. Brown not to go off alone on this trip. It is also in evidence that he was not permitted generally to go alone on such journeys, and that the last was the exception."

Mr. N. T. Colby, special examiner, in his report says:
"The evidence now on file convinces me that the claim is one of merit: that the 'spells' whatever they may have been—apoplexy, epilepsy, or heart failure—were the result of an enfeebling disease contracted in his military service, to which no doubt his long imprisonment in Libby Prison at Richmond greatly contributed."

Col. Wade was one of the most distinguished soldiers of Indiana, and all the evidence shows him to have been an honorable, upright, and most excellent gentleman.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

OBE SUTHERLAND.

The next business in order was the bill (S. 1379) to provide for a pension for Obe Sutherland, late a teamster in the Quartermaster's Department of the United States volunteer army.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Obe Sutherland, late a teamster in the Quartermaster's Department of the United States volunteer army, on the pension rolls and pay him a pension of $50 per month.

The report (by Mr. MARTIN) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1379) granting a pension to Obe Sutherland, submit the following report:

Your committee, having duly considered said bill, adopt the report of the Senate Committee on Pensions, which is as follows, to wit:

"This applicant was a teamster, and his claim was rejected by the Pension Bureau April 8, 1891, on the ground that he was not in the military service."

"The testimony shows that while enroute from Salt Lake to Fort Bridger, during the winter of 1894-'95, both of his hands and feet were frozen, resulting in the amputation of both of his feet at the instep and the fingers of both hands."

"It seems that this applicant was a slave at the beginning of the war, but he ran away from his owner in 1862 and went with a squad of United States soldiers to Pilot Knob. He states that shortly after this he was examined and received a military uniform and accouterments, and believed that he was a private in some company of the Twenty-fifth Missouri Infantry Volunteers. They drilled him some time and finally gave him his choice of taking a six-mule team or to go to Gen. Blunt at Fort Scott. He chose the six-mule team and freighted from Leavenworth to Salt Lake. About mid-winter of 1894-'95, while in the Green River Valley, en route between Salt Lake and Fort Bridger to get military supplies, the train was caught in a snowstorm. The snow became knee-deep, and Sutherland's hands and feet were frozen, with the result above stated."

"His present condition is most pitiable. By an operation last winter, rendered necessary by his injuries, some of the bones in his feet were removed. He sleeps on a bed of straw in a barn, and manages to drive a buggy for his board by holding the reins in the stubs of his arms."

"The committee believe that the claimant should be pensioned."

"And your committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill."

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, I will not consent to see any bill passed here that gives a man $50 a month for doing nothing; and I say to the chairman of the committee [Mr. MARTIN] that I shall be glad if he will consent that this bill be passed over, because I shall feel constrained to make the point of no quorum against it even in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MCKINNEY. Without investigation?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes, sir. I will not consent to give any man $50 a month for doing nothing. There are thousands of men in the country who are unable to earn $50 a month by their work.

A MEMBER. Some of them do not make that much in twelve months.

Mr. BAILEY. No, sir. Of the 4,000,000 negroes in the South there is not one in a thousand that makes it.

Mr. MARTIN. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Texas to a statement of facts. The gentleman speaks of many persons not being able to earn $50 a month. Let me remind him of the fact that for twenty-five years—

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman is consuming time for nothing, for I shall insist on the point of no quorum rather than allow this bill to pass even in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Chairman, in view of the thinness of the House—

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Will the gentleman from Indiana consent to an amendment striking out "fifty" and inserting "fifty-five"?

Several MEMBERS. Say "twenty-five."

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I move to strike out "$50" and insert "$20."

Several MEMBERS. Say twenty-five.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. No, $20 is enough.

Mr. BAILEY. Well, I will agree to that; I will agree to allow the bill to go through here giving this man the wages of a farm hand; but even then I shall vote against the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out "$50" where it occurs in the bill and insert in lieu thereof "$20."

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Chairman, I have been out for a few moments from the Hall, but I wish the gentleman who moves this reduction would examine the case a little further. I think he would have no disposition to insist upon this amendment. This matter was brought to the attention of the committee by a Senator from Missouri.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Let me say to the gentleman that the Government does not propose to pay a bounty, but to support the man handsomely; and that is as far as I think we ought to go.

Mr. CURTIS. This is an exceedingly meritorious case, but if the gentlemen insist—

Mr. BAILEY. I do insist.

Mr. CURTIS. Very well; I have nothing further to say, if the committee thinks it right to cut the amount down.

Mr. TARSNEY. Before final action is had on this bill I desire to say just this: That while I have grave doubts of the wisdom of the extension of the pension system to those who were not in the military service, if you concede that principle at all, then I can see no equity or justice in the reduction of this man's pension from $50 to $20 per month. It is not a question of the Government compensating this man for the loss of ability to earn a livelihood. We take into consideration in the report of the committee, and it is no doubt set forth clearly in the report, that this man has suffered from injuries received, which sufferings can not be compensated in dollars and cents. Not only is he deprived of his power to earn a livelihood, but for the past twenty-five years he has suffered agonies from his injuries, as shown in this report, and, I doubt not truthfully, such that the gentleman from Georgia could not be compensated for with all the wealth of the country.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Would $50 a month compensate him in your opinion?

Mr. TARSNEY. No, sir; no amount would compensate him. Mr. LIVINGSTON. Then the Government ought not to undertake to do it. I am willing to support him, and that is as far as we can go.

Mr. TARSNEY. I think the amount fixed in the report is as low as it should be. I would deny him everything unless you give him what the bill asks for, which is only what is fair and equitable.

Mr. BAILEY. Very well, I will be glad to deny him everything so far as I am concerned. I have no hesitation whatever in stating that I agree with the gentleman from Missouri that it is a very bad policy to pension men who were not in the military service of the Government.

Mr. CURTIS. My friend must certainly be mistaken in that statement. This man was employed in the military service.

Mr. BAILEY. Oh, yes; I understand, driving a wagon.

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, driving a wagon; but it must be remembered that he was assigned from the ranks to the performance of that duty. He was found to be an excellent driver, was detailed for that purpose from the ranks, and remained with the team and with the property of the Government until he received these injuries for which this pension is proposed.

Mr. BAILEY. I think my friend from New York had better examine this case a little more closely, and he will find that the man was not a soldier.

Mr. CURTIS. I have the word of a Senator from Missouri, and I have seen the action taken upon the case in the Senate committee—

Mr. BAILEY. The report that was read from the desk here does not say that he was a soldier. He thought he was, but that did not make him one.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Why cannot he draw a pension under the general law if he was a soldier?

Mr. CURTIS. I can not tell you the reason nor the details connected with the Pension Office. But if he was first enlisted and then transferred by the order of the commander of his company or regiment he certainly was a soldier. Possibly he may not have been mustered in as a soldier, but he was enrolled as such.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Oh, he ran away from his master and went there for a living.

Mr. CURTIS. No, sir; he had no master to run away from.

Mr. BAILEY. If he was a soldier why could he not get on the pension roll under the law?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. That was my question.

Mr. CURTIS. Let me explain. This man was enrolled and went into the service, but it turned out that in the assignment of the different duties to be performed he was found to be an excellent teamster, and was assigned to that department, when he was desirous of going and would have preferred being in the ranks. He was left in charge of the train, and it must be remembered that it was as important to the command to bring forward the provisions and the ammunition trains as anything else.

However, if the gentleman prefers $20, if that is his measure of the sufferings this man has undergone and the responsibilities of the Government towards him, let us give him the amount and pass to other questions.

Mr. BAILEY. I believe I have the floor yet.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman to yield to inquiries.

Mr. BAILEY. I am perfectly willing to yield for a free interchange of views.

But, inasmuch as I made the first objection, I feel it incumbent upon me to say this in response to what the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. TARSNEY] has said, that while it is true in this case and in many others that the Government can not make compensation for sufferings undergone—for it must be remembered that the Government never undertakes to compensate the widow for her grief over the loss of the husband who sleeps in some unknown grave—the most that it has ever been asked to do for the widow or crippled soldier is what the husband or the soldier himself could have done for themselves had they not been disabled in the Government service.

Now, if you proceed upon that principle, I submit it to the candor of gentleman that you have no right to assume that the beneficiary under this bill could have earned more than 4,000,000 of his race in the South could have earned. I do not think so. If you are going to undertake a pension policy that compensates people for the loss of their husbands, fathers, brothers, sons, then, indeed, we will have reached the point which Senator HOAR declares we have reached, a bankrupted Government. But if you adopt the other, and as it appears to me the more sensible policy of doing for them what they might have done for themselves, this man is certainly not entitled to over $20 a month, if he is entitled to anything.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON].

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

NATHANIEL LANG.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 2370) for the relief of Nathaniel Lang.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Nathaniel Lang be, and he is hereby, relieved and absolved from the sentence adjudged against him by a court-martial on the 20th day of January, A. D. 1865, and he is hereby restored as of that date to his rank as captain of Company F, One hundred and twenty-first Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, and that the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to issue to said Capt. Nathaniel Lang an honorable discharge from said company and regiment, to date and to take effect from January 20, A. D. 1865.

Mr. HARRIES. Mr. Chairman, I raise a point of order against that bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. HARRIES. It is that under the rule this bill is not properly before the committee. At these Friday night sessions we have authority to remove charges of desertion only. This is to relieve a person from the sentence of a court-martial.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill does not show on its face whether the court-martial involved a charge of desertion or not.

Mr. TARSNEY. We had better have the report read.

Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey. I would suggest that pending the decision of the Chair upon the point of order the report be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the report. The bill is not sufficiently explicit to enable the Chair to determine whether the point of order is well taken or not.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2370) for the relief of Nathaniel Lang, having considered the same, would recommend the passage of the bill as a measure of relief to a meritorious soldier.

The facts upon which your committee rely for such recommendation are set forth in the report from the Secretary of War, and various affidavits of parties who knew the facts, submitted herewith and made a part of this report. The Committee on Military Affairs reported favorably upon a similar bill in the Fiftieth and Fifty-first Congresses.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest to the committee that this report is of great length, and possibly the gentleman who submitted the report [Mr. CROSBY] can make a statement sufficiently explicit to determine the question of order. The bill itself does not reveal the nature of the charge against the soldier, upon which court-martial proceedings were had.

Mr. CROSBY. Perhaps I can explain it, if the Clerk will again read the title of the bill, so that I can know what bill it is.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill for the relief of Nathaniel Lang.

Mr. CROSBY. I think the report had better be read.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the report will have to be read, because it is impossible for the Chair to determine from the reading of the bill whether the court-martial involved the charge of desertion or not.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. Mr. Chairman, the bill under consideration was introduced by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR]. He is not present. I have some knowledge of the facts of the case. The charge was not one of desertion, but of disrespect to a superior officer, growing out of the use of too much liquor on a certain occasion.

The CHAIRMAN. On the statement made by the gentleman the bill is clearly not in order at this time and the Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

DE LOSS CRAMER.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 793) to amend the military record of De Loss Cramer.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to correct the military record of De Loss Cramer, late lieutenant of Company F, Fourteenth Regiment New York Volunteers, by expunging from said record the dishonorable discharge imposed by a court-martial.

The committee recommended the following amendment:

To strike out all after the word "volunteers," in line 6, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"And to issue to said Cramer an honorable discharge; but the said Cramer shall not be entitled to any pay or emoluments on account of the passage of this act."

Mr. TARSNEY. Let us have the report read.

The report (by Mr. ROCKWELL) was read as follows.

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 793) to amend the military record of De Loss Cramer, respectfully submit the following report:

De Loss Cramer enlisted May 17, 1861, as a private in Company F, Fourteenth New York Volunteers, to serve for the term of two years. He was a brave and faithful man and soldier; was early promoted to be first lieutenant, and so continued until within about two months of the end of the period of his enlistment, about which time some visitors from the Ninety-seventh New York Regiment, raised in the neighborhood of his home, visited the boys of the Fourteenth Regiment, and some of them becoming convivial and were making considerable noise when Lieut. Cramer joined them. The jollification attracted the attention of Col. Davis, passing by, who asked the boys to make less noise, when one John Manchester, one of the visiting boys of the Ninety-seventh Regiment, said: "Go to hell, you son of a gun."

Col. Davis charged the utterance of these words upon Lieut. Cramer, substituting for the word "gun" a more offensive word, and upon this charge Lieut. Cramer was court-martialed and convicted of being drunk and disorderly and of speaking the offensive words imputed to him. Cramer was a man so loyal to his friend that he would rather suffer wrong than betray him, and he therefore plead not guilty, but made no defense.

After the close of the war proofs were submitted to the War Department showing that Cramer was not the person who had used the words imputed to him, but the Department held that as Cramer was also convicted of being drunk and disorderly, the conviction would not be disturbed.

It is believed that sentence of dishonorable dismissal from the service would not have followed a conviction upon the sole charge of being drunk and disorderly, and as the proofs presented entirely exonerate Lieut. Cramer from the graver offense imputed to him, his record should be amended and an honorable discharge be granted him.

Your committee have reported an amendment to the bill proposed, by striking out all after the word "volunteers," in line 6, and by adding at the end thereof the words "and to issue to said Cramer an honorable discharge," and as so amended recommend that the bill do pass.

Mr. BUTLER. I raise the point of order that this bill does not come under the rule for Friday night, it not being a charge of desertion, nor a bill reported from the Committee on Pensions or on Invalid Pensions.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will examine the bill.

Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey. I raise the point of order that the point made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. BUTLER] comes too late. The report has been read, which we all know to be in the nature of debate.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New Jersey insist upon his point of order?

Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey. Yes; that it comes too late.

Mr. BUTLER. We had to wait until we saw the nature of it before we could make the point.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is inclined to think that the point of order made by the gentleman from New Jersey is well taken. The report is in the nature of debate.

Mr. TARSNEY. Is not this a jurisdictional question? If the House has not jurisdiction on this subject at this Friday night session, then no laches and no failure to make the point at a particular time would make any difference.

The CHAIRMAN. It seems to the Chair that the point of order should be made before the consideration of a measure is entered upon, and the reading of the report is in the nature of debate.

Mr. TARSNEY. This House is vested with a limited jurisdiction upon these matters.

The CHAIRMAN. That is true.

Mr. TARSNEY. And therefore it is a jurisdictional question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN] and to members of the committee that, in the judgment of the Chair, the committee should adhere not only to the letter of the rule which provides for these evening sessions but also to its spirit. This bill seems to be without the terms of the rule, and therefore the Chair thinks it ought not to be considered.

Mr. BUTLER. I would like to make another suggestion. I rose to make this point of order two or three times, and went to the Chair to make an inquiry on the point, and then came back and was trying to make the point of order.

Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey. I will solve all this difficulty. I made this point upon my own responsibility, and upon the same responsibility I withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will now hear the point of order raised by the gentleman from Iowa. Will the gentleman kindly state his point of order again, as the Chair was not giving attention to the bill when it was being read.

Mr. BUTLER. The point of order I made was that this bill is not reported by the Committee on Pensions or the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and does not come under the other list, for the removal of the charges of desertion, and therefore not in order for consideration on Friday nights.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Chairman, would it not be in the power of the House—

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. CURTIS. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry. Would it not be within the power of the House to grant unanimous consent for this bill to go forward, the report having been read, and its consideration having been entered upon?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the power of the House during these evening sessions is limited by the terms of the special rule under which it is acting.

MARY ISABELLA HUTCHISON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5377) granting a pension to Mary Isabella Hutchison.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary Isabella Hutchison, sister of William Hutchison, late of Company A, One hundred and third Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. KRIBBS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5377) granting a pension to Mary Isabella Hutchison, submit the following report:

William Hutchison enlisted in Company A, One hundred and fifth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, on August 23, 1861, and died while in the service on the 24th day of October, 1862. The claimant, his sister, and another sister since dead, were living with him at and prior to his enlistment, and were dependent upon him for support. Neither of them was ever married.

The evidence before your committee, consisting of the affidavits of nine neighbors, one of whom is the family physician, shows that the claimant is not of sound mind and never was; that she is poor, incapable of earning her own living, and entirely dependent upon others for her support. Her helpless and dependent condition is becoming more serious as she grows older. She is now 54 years old. There is not now and never has been any pension on account of the death of this soldier. The parents were dead before the soldier's enlistment.

The committee think this a proper case for a favorable report, and recommend the passage of the bill with the following amendment, adding after the last word of the bill the words "deceased, at the rate of $18 per month, to be paid to her legal guardian or person legally appointed to have charge of her person and estate."

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask a member of the committee, or any gentleman who has this bill in charge, why the amount is placed at $18 rather than the amount usually reported in such bills?

Mr. KRIBBS. On account of her requiring a guardian to look after her person and to superintend the expenditure of the pension. It is the usual amount given in such cases.

Mr. SCOTT. Now, I would like to ask another question, if the gentleman will answer it or some other gentleman, and that is whether it has been customary in this House to pass bills granting a pension to sisters of a soldier? I understand that the rule of the Senate is not to do that.

Mr. KRIBBS. It has been done in former cases, I understand. The gentleman will learn from the reading of the report that this sister and another sister lived with the soldier before his enlistment. The other sister died, leaving this sister with no one to care for her. The soldier contributed to their support, and neither of them was ever married.

Mr. MEREDITH. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Is she a person of unsound mind?

Mr. KRIBBS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MEREDITH. Why not send her to an asylum in your State? Have you not an asylum in that State?

Mr. KRIBBS. We have.

Mr. MEREDITH. That is the proper place to send her.

Mr. KRIBBS. The amount is fixed at $18 because she can not take care of her person, and she requires a guardian to expend this fund for her benefit.

Mr. SCOTT. Then she requires a nurse.

Mr. KRIBBS. There is no nurse.

Mr. LANE. I will say that this is the usual amount in such cases, and has been for years.

Mr. SCOTT. Has it been customary to grant pensions to sisters?

Mr. LANE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment recommended by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with the recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. JENNIE B. MORRIS.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1338) granting a pension to Mrs. Jennie B. Morris.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the name of Mrs. Jennie B. Morris, of Des Moines, Park County, Iowa, as the widow of George H. Harris, late a teamster in the Twenty-sixth Regiment of Iowa Volunteers, and pay her a full widow's pension from and after the passage of this act.

The report (by Mr. BUTLER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1338) granting a pension to Mrs. Jennie B. Morris, submit the following report:

This applicant, Jennie B. Morris, was the widow of George H. Harris, late a teamster in the Twenty-sixth Regiment of Iowa Volunteers, and as such widow she was pensioned under certificate No. 9222, under the name of Jane Harris, which pension she continued to receive until she was married to Mr. E. T. Morris, August 16, 1877.

Said marriage proved a very unhappy one, with no alleged fault on the part of this claimant, and on April 14, 1887, the district court of Polk County, Iowa, did grant a decree of divorce legally separating the parties to said marriage, and leaving this claimant entirely dependent on her own labor for support.

Evidence to establish the excellent character of this claimant, Mrs. Jennie B. Morris, is furnished by numerous prominent citizens of Des Moines, Iowa, among them Hon. Gilbert B. Pray, clerk of the supreme court of Iowa, Isaac Brandt, postmaster of Des Moines, Iowa, and John R. Shaffer, secretary of the State Fair Association of Iowa.

This claimant is now in destitute condition, and greatly in need of the pension formerly received and now asked to be restored, as evidenced by many of the best of Des Moines citizens.

All the alleged facts in this case are also directly sustained by the declarations of Hon. J. A. T. HULL, member of Congress from the Seventh district of Iowa in this House.

The case appears to be a worthy one and in harmony with numerous precedents.

Wherefore, your committee reports back the bill with the recommendation that it be amended as follows: Strike out the word "Park," in the fifth line, and insert in its stead the word "Polk," so as to read "Polk County, Iowa;" also, add to the last clause of said bill the following: "And during the continuance of her present unmarried state," and that as so amended the bill do pass.

Mr. TARSNEY. Mr. Chairman, now we have got along very well to-night. We have had some discrimination and consideration in these cases. The bills have been considered on their merits, and we found no difficulty in transacting business when considering them on their merits. Now, I think, we have got to a place where we should be a little cautious. A pension seems to have been given to a man who was in the employ of the Government as a teamster and not as a soldier. After he died his widow received, perhaps under this indiscriminate pensioning business, this pension. It was possibly passed inadvertently, and perhaps she was granted a pension wrongfully.

Mr. HULL. Will the gentleman yield to me for just one statement?

Mr. TARSNEY. Certainly.

Mr. HULL. The man was enlisted as a private in that regiment and detailed as a teamster, just as in all our companies men were enlisted as soldiers and detailed as teamsters. The gentleman knows that from his own experience.

Mr. TARSNEY. The report does not show that.

Mr. HULL. He was pensioned as a private soldier.

Mr. TARSNEY. The report does not contain that information.

Mr. HULL. The report perhaps may not contain that statement, but that is the fact.

Mr. O'NEILL of Missouri. Why does not she get a pension in the usual manner, from the Pension Bureau?

Mr. HULL. Because she married again.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as I drew the report myself, I would like to make a statement in regard to the reason it does not mention the service. It was perhaps inadvertent; but the fact that this woman received a pension on the death of her husband in the regular way of receiving pensions was considered evidence sufficient that her husband was a soldier, and if that is not stated in the report it was possibly left out because it was not thought necessary to state the fact, but it was a fact that he was an enlisted man.

Mr. TARSNEY. Concedethat she was the widow of a soldier detailed as a teamster; he died and she drew her pension until such time as she voluntarily relinquished it in order to enter into the marriage relation with another person. She married and voluntarily gave up her pension. Now, the Government can not be held to insure the happiness of all these second marriages. [Laughter.] I do not want the Government to be placed in the position of an insurer that when one of these widows marries a divorce will not follow.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. But has it not been the uniform practice in this House when the widow of a soldier remarried and again became single, and when a bill to restore her pension was reported here, to pass that bill? And is not the Government a gainer by the remarriage in these cases?

Mr. TARSNEY. There have been many customs established here in regard to this class of business that are more honored in the breach than in the observance. When this woman ceased to occupy the position of the widow of that soldier the obligation of the Government to aid in her support ceased, and she took the risk of obtaining support from her second husband.

Mr. RAY. Did not this widow do the best she could to relieve the Government? She went and married again and did all she could to relieve the Government of the expense of her pension. [Laughter.] She acted in good faith. Now, if she has made a failure of it, she ought not to be blamed.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. She had her choice to take her pension or her husband; why did not she keep her pension?

Mr. RAY. But she relieved the Government of the payment of that pension for the period of her remarriage. Now, ought we to take advantage of that fact?

Mr. TARSNEY. Suppose—for there is nothing to the contrary in the report—that this woman entered into this second marriage to better her condition; that she married a man who had plenty of property and that, because they could not live together happily, she obtained a divorce and is now independent by reason of the alimony that she receives; yet she comes here and asks for a restoration of her pension.

Mr. KILGORE. Would not this character of legislation have a tendency to break up families? [Laughter.] Many of these women might prefer to have $10 or $15 a month to a sorry husband. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey. And would not that be justifiable in some cases? [Laughter.]

Mr. KILGORE. I think perhaps it would, but we do not want to legislate against public policy. Now, it is public policy to encourage people to get married and stay married, and everything should be done to make marriage a success, but this has a tendency to make it a failure. [Laughter.]

Mr. TARSNEY. So far as I am individually concerned I will vote a pension to any woman who has been deprived by death of the support of her husband who was a soldier so long as she herself manifests a regard for that relationship and for his memory by remaining a widow; but when she marries again she ceases to occupy that relation to him and the obligation of the Government to her ceases, and I will not vote for any pension under the conditions presented by the report in this case.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Missouri said that this woman was probably living upon alimony resulting from her second marriage and divorce.

Mr. TARSNEY. I did not say that. I said there was nothing in the report to show that that was not the case, or might not be the case.

Mr. HULL. I will accept that statement. Now, I want to say for the benefit of the gentleman and the committee that this woman received no alimony whatever, but on the contrary was left in much worse condition than before the marriage. When the divorce was granted she was left absolutely without means of support except by her own efforts. Her husband lives in Des Moines, and he is a gentleman that I regard highly in many respects, although I think he has failed largely in his duty. He gives to this committee a statement that the divorce was from no fault of his wife's, but solely on account of his own fault.

Mr. TARSNEY. I have not imputed any fault to her.

Mr. HULL. As has been suggested, she saved the Government this pension money during the period of her remarriage, for if she had not married again she would have been drawing the pension right along. She is now earning her living by her own efforts as a sempstress.

Mr. KILGORE. Has the husband any means?

Mr. HULL. If he has he keeps them.

Mr. KILGORE. Is he not well off?

Mr. HULL. I think he is not. He is an attorney there. At all events, he contributes nothing to her support.

Mr. MEREDITH. You say the second husband was an attorney?

Mr. HULL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MEREDITH. Then he knew that if she remarried the pension would cease?

Mr. HULL. Undoubtedly.

Mr. MEREDITH. And she also must have known from him that when she remarried it would cease.

Mr. HULL. Oh, yes. She lived with this man only a short time and then the marriage tie was dissolved. She went to work to make a living for herself without appealing to the Government, and the question now is whether, when she is old and absolutely unable to continue the struggle longer, this House will refuse to restore her pension.

Mr. MEREDITH. This woman entered into this contract with her eyes open; she took the risk of this business; and, failing to make a happy marriage, she now comes back and asks the Government to renew the pension.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, if this were the first case of this kind ever presented to the Government I would say there might be some reason in the argument urged here. But the Government having time and time again recognized the justice of placing these old ladies on the pension roll under circumstances of this kind, I claim that it comes with poor grace from the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. TARSNEY], who was himself a Union soldier, to raise his voice against it.

Mr. TARSNEY. The gentleman says that if this were a new question he would have no hesitancy about adopting my view of it. Is it ever too late to abolish a bad practice?

Mr. HULL. I do not admit that it is a bad precedent. I said that my friend from Missouri might raise his objection with more probability of success if this were a new question. But unless there is something directly affecting the character of the claimant, it seems to me that to single out a particular case and say that we will refuse to renew the pension is not fair.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the gentleman state the age of this woman?

Mr. HULL. I think she is about 70.

Mr. KILGORE. Was she the wife of the soldier at the time of the war?

Mr. HULL. Yes; she was the wife of the soldier all through the war. And I think I can state why she married the second time. It was supposed she would better her condition. She had a little child, and was working with a sewing machine to support and educate her daughter. I have no doubt she thought she would better herself.

Mr. KILGORE. By marrying a lawyer! [Laughter.]

Mr. HULL. Yes, by marrying a lawyer.

Mr. MCKINNEY. How long did she live with this last husband?

Mr. HULL. One year.

Mr. MCKINNEY. Then she lived with a lawyer one year!

Mr. HULL. Yes; and she ought to have a pension for that. [Laughter.]

But it does seem to me, gentlemen, that this case does not stand alone. It is a case of which we have many parallels. It is a case in which we have the testimony of the best people of Des Moines, without regard to party, that this woman is absolutely a deserving woman; that she is absolutely poor, and dependent upon her own efforts for her daily bread. It seems to me that under all the circumstances this proposition to restore her to the pension roll presents as good a case as this House has ever had before it in the past.

Mr. HAYES of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, it is unquestionably true that the precedents in the past action of Congress have been in favor of granting pensions in this class of cases. And certainly if we are going to change the precedent and the rule heretofore adopted there ought to be some strong and cogent reason for doing so. If this were an entirely new proposition, I should be in favor of the rule as it has been adopted. Certainly Congress ought to do nothing to discourage the marriage of this class of women. The marriage in such cases is an advantage to the Government, as it is thereby relieved from the burden of paying the pension. I repeat we ought to do nothing to discourage—

Mr. MEREDITH. Do you think that the Government ought to encourage divorces? And do we not encourage divorces when we allow women under these circumstances to come back and have their pensions renewed?

Mr. HAYES of Iowa. No, sir, we are not encouraging divorces; and any such theory is decidedly far-fetched, for the reason that if this were a matter resting on business considerations the woman would not marry and give up her pension. The fact that she does so shows that it is a matter outside of any question of mere business.

But to return to my line of remark, I say that Congress ought to do nothing from any standpoint—from the standpoint of business or any other—to discourage marriages under these circumstances, for the reason that so long as the marriage relation continues the Government is relieved from the payment of the pension and these marriages do not all turn out to be failures; so the Government is a gainer in any event. I say that in those few and exceptional cases where by reason of the death of the second husband, or by reason of the second marriage being so unfortunate that the parties can not stay together and therefore become divorced, the widow is left dependent and in poor circumstances, there is no reason why the Government should not restore to her the pension which she lost by reason of a marriage that has proved to be unfortunate.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendments, which the Clerk will report.

The amendments were again read, considered, and adopted.

The question recurred on laying the bill aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the yeas seemed to have it.

Mr. HULL. I demand a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 50, noes 16.

Mr. EVERETT. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will order tellers.

Mr. EVERETT and Mr. MARTIN were appointed tellers.

Mr. SCOTT. Pending the division by tellers, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. HULL. That will leave it on the Calendar, to be called up hereafter?

The CHAIRMAN. That will be the effect of the order. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

MISS ADDA L. BOODGER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5766) granting a pension to Miss Adda L. Boodger, of Lockport, N. Y.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to grant a pension to Miss Adda L. Boodger, daughter of William Boodger, who served in the Ninety-fourth New York Infantry, enlisting in January, 1862, serving until June, 1865.

The report (by Mr. CURTIS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5766) granting a pension to Adda L. Boodger, submit the following report:

William Boodger enlisted in Company I, Ninety-fourth New York Infantry, February 14, 1864, and was discharged June 2, 1865, by reason of disability from gunshot fracture of left ileum received at battle of Weldon Railroad. He died April 16, 1875, from swelling and abscess of throat.

Adda L. Boodger, the daughter of the above-named soldier, was born July 9, 1854, and was consequently nearly 21 years of age at the date of his death.

It is alleged that the soldier left no widow surviving him, and it is shown by the affidavit of Dr. Shimeon T. Clark, of Lockport, N. Y., that from her childhood the daughter, Adda L. Boodger, has suffered from curvature of the spine, causing anchylosis of the dorsal vertebrae; she has also a deformity of the breast bone. She is 4 feet 4 inches in height, weighs 75 pounds, is active and intelligent; but by reason of her deformity and weakness has always been dependent on her friends. The father left no estate, and but for the clemency of friends the claimant would have been a public charge.

William Landers and Frank Zimmerman testify that the claimant has two brothers who served in the Army and who are both still living; that her father received a pension during his lifetime, and that her mother died some fourteen months before her father's death; that the claimant is small, feeble, and practically entirely helpless.

The claim was rejected by the Pension Bureau on the ground that there is no provision of law under which she can be pensioned in view of the fact that the claimant was over 16 years of age at the date of the soldier's death.

In view of the physical condition of this soldier's daughter, your committee return the bill with the recommendation that it do pass, after being amended as follows:

In line 4 strike out the words "grant a pension to" and insert in lieu thereof the words "place upon the pension rolls, at the rate of $10 per month, the name of;" in line 5, after the word "in," insert the words "Company I, of;" in line 6, strike out all the words after the word "Infantry," and strike out all of lines 7 and 8.

The amendments recommended by the committee were severally considered and agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM S. WOODWARD.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2398) granting a pension to William S. Woodward.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William S. Woodward, of Brooks County, Ga., late a private in Captain Durant's company of the battalion of South Carolina volunteers, commanded by Major Harlee, in the Indian war of 1836, at the rate of $8 per month.

The report (by Mr. WILSON of Missouri) was read as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2398) granting a pension to William S. Woodward, have considered the same and report:

The claimant was (as shown by the records of the War Department) enrolled at Charleston, S. C., January 20, 1837, as a private, to serve three months in Capt. Durant's company, Harlee's battalion, South Carolina militia, and was mustered out of service with the company April 29, 1837.

From the sworn statements of the claimant and Garington Owens and Schley Owens, citizens of Brooks County, Ga., it appears that the claimant is now 77 years old, so infirm as to be unable to do any manual labor, in very bad financial condition, and with three helpless daughters dependent upon him for support.

There are many precedents for the allowance of the pension, and your committee therefore return the bill with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. TARSNEY. That report, as I gather from the reading of what I could hear of it, recites the fact that this claimant was enrolled in the State militia of South Carolina. I desire to ask if there is any information that he ever performed any military service for the United States? It might have been in time of peace, of course, but unless there be some information on that point we do not want to establish a precedent for giving service pensions for the militia of a State. I ask, for information, if he actually performed any service, as I was not able to hear a portion of the report?

Mr. WILSON of Missouri. I will inform my colleague that these troops were raised by the State, and were in the service of the United States, commanded by United States officers.

Mr. TARSNEY. That is the information I desire to receive. In what war were they engaged?

Mr. WILSON of Missouri. They were in actual service, as is shown by the report of the War Department.

Mr. TARSNEY. In what year was this man in the service?

Mr. WILSON of Missouri. In 1836 or 1837.

Mr. TARSNEY. That is satisfactory.

Mr. WILSON of Missouri. It was in the Indian wars; what is known as the war of 1836. It began in 1836.

Mr. TARSNEY. That explanation is satisfactory.

Mr. ENOCHS. What is his age now?

Mr. WILSON of Missouri. He is about 77 years old.

Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out $8 per month and insert $12. The pensions for the war of 1812 allowed all of these old soldiers $12 per month, and it has been the rule of the committee to grant pensions at that rate. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER], who introduced this bill, thought $8 was the rate, but intended to offer that amendment. I will therefore perform the service which the gentleman himself desired to perform, because of his absence; that is, to strike out "eight" and insert "twelve."

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. WILSON of Missouri, it was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MERIDY SMITH.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to call up a bill to increase the pension of the widow of a Revolutionary soldier. It will take but a minute. The lady is very old. There are only eight of these pensioners, I believe, in the United States. There can be no objection to it. It will take three months to reach it on the Calendar, and the old lady may be dead by that time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill, after which the Chair will ask if there be objection to its consideration.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of Meridy Smith, widow of William Smith, a soldier in the Revolutionary war, from $12 per month to $30 per month, and pay the same to her during her natural life.

The report (by Mr. MOSES) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5722) increasing the pension of Meridy Smith, have considered the same and respectfully report as follows:

A similar bill was before your committee at the second session of the Fifty-first Congress, and the favorable report therein, numbered H. R. 3689, is adopted by your committee as their report, and the bill is returned, recommending its passage.

[House Report No. 3689, Fifty-first Congress, second session.]

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 13061) increasing the pension of Mrs. Meridy Smith, have considered the same and report:

Meridy Smith is the widow of William Smith, who served as a soldier in the Revolutionary war. She is now receiving a pension at $12 per month under the general law pensioning widows of the soldiers of the Revolution.

Accompanying the bill is the testimony of William Wise and C. H. Stamps, citizens of Newman, Ga., setting forth that Mrs. Smith's pension of $144 per year is insufficient to afford her a comfortable support, and that she has no property whatever, aside from a few poor articles of household furniture and wearing apparel; also that she is now about 85 years old and requires the constant attention of another person.

The passage of the bill is recommended.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MOSES]?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on laying aside the bill with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Chairman, this is a very considerable increase—from $12 to $30 a month. A hundred per cent would be a very considerable increase.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. This lady is a Revolutionary pensioner.

Mr. MOSES. There are only eight of them in the United States.

Mr. KILGORE. But I am talking about the consistency of the House in these matters. Of course the amount is very small, taken by itself.

Mr. MOSES. If the gentleman from Texas will allow me, I will state—

Mr. ENOCHS. She is a very old lady, and there are only eight of these pensioners, as I understand, in the United States; and $30 is certainly not too much.

Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey. Let us put them all in.

Mr. ENOCHS. She can not last more than a year or two probably.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

BETSEY WORTHINGTON.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 5200) for the relief of Betsey Worthington.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, at the rate of $40 per month, the name of Betsey Worthington, widow of Ransford Worthington, who was a member of the Massachusetts militia and served in the war of 1812.

The report (by Mr. WILSON of Missouri) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5200) for the relief of Betsey Worthington, have considered the same and report:

The claimant is the widow of Ransford Worthington, who was a private of Capt. H. Day's company of Massachusetts Militia in the war of 1812. He was a pensioner on account of said service until his death, which occurred October 16, 1878, and his widow (this claimant) was then placed on the pension roll. She receives $12 per month.

The testimony of Dr. Judson W. Hastings, of Agawam, Mass., shows that the claimant is 96 years old, and without any means of support except her pension; also, that on November 13, 1891, she suffered a fracture of left thigh and has since required the constant services of nurses day and night, being unable to move herself in bed without help.

The doctor also testifies that the claimant has other physical troubles due to weakness and old age, which add to the difficulty of caring for her, and that she is a worthy woman who gave two sons to the Union Army.

The above testimony is fully corroborated under oath by Charles W. Hastings, postmaster of Agawam, Mass.

The passage of the bill is recommended with an amendment fixing the rate of pension at $25 per month, and showing that the same is to be allowed in lieu of the amount now drawn by her.

Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, if this amount is to be reduced in accordance with the suggestion of the committee, it ought not to be reduced below the rate fixed in the case we have just considered. In the last bill the increase was to $30 per month, and it seems to me that this amendment reducing the amount to $25 per month ought not to prevail.

Mr. SCOTT. This is for the war of 1812.

Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey. But I understand this lady is 96 years of age and crippled by reason of a broken hip and otherwise helpless.

Mr. CROSBY. And she is ten years older than the other lady. Mr. KILGORE. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will be satisfied with $25 per month.

Mr. CROSBY. I am not satisfied with it, but I will have to be satisfied with what I can get.

Mr. KILGORE. Is this the same bill the gentleman spoke to me about.

Mr. CROSBY. It is the same bill. Now, here is the point about it: This woman is 96 years of age. She is supported by charity. She is bedridden with a broken hip and has to have a nurse all the time. She may be dead by this time. If she is not she will not probably live six months.

Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey. The amendment proposes to reduce the amount to $25 a month. I move to amend the amendment by making it $30 a month.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is first upon the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN].

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment proposed by the committee, as amended, was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

Subsequently,

Mr. WILSON of Missouri said: Mr. Chairman, there was another amendment recommended by the committee, to the effect that this amount should be in lieu of the amount she is now receiving. This lady is now receiving $12 a month. I do not think the latter amendment was acted upon by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. It seems that the amendment was not acted upon. If there be no objection the amendment will now be considered and the Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Said pension to be in lieu of the amount now drawn by her.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection this amendment, reported by the committee will be considered as agreed to, and the amended bill will be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

GEORGE W. WHITE.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 6767) granting an increase of pension to George W. White.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of George W. White, late a member of Company B, Gray's Battalion Arkansas Volunteers, in the Mexican war, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

The report (by Mr. WILSON of Missouri) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3767) increasing the pension of George W. White, have considered the same, and respectfully report as follows:

The claimant was a private in Company B, Gray's Battalion Arkansas Volunteers, and served nine months in the war with Mexico. He is now pensioned at $9 per month under the Mexican war service pension act of January 29, 1887.

In his application for relief by special act of Congress the claimant swears that he is 85 years old and that his wife is 89 years old and in very feeble health, confined to her bed most of the time. He further avers that he owns no personal property whatever, except household goods, and that his pension constitutes his sole income.

Hon. CASE BRODERICK, a Representative in Congress from Kansas, certifies that he has been acquainted with claimant for twenty-five years, and knows the facts stated by the claimant to be true. Also that his sole property consists of 20 acres of ground in the country, with very cheap improvements thereon, and that he has no income for himself and aged wife except his said pension of $9 per month.

The passage of the bill is respectfully recommended, with an amendment fixing the rate of pension at $20 per month.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

JONATHAN RAMEY.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 3587) for the relief of Jonathan Ramey, Mexican war veteran.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Jonathan Ramey, of Perry County, Ark., having, while serving in the First Kentucky Cavalry, received serious injuries at the battle of Buena Vista, which have disabled him ever since, he is hereby granted a pension of $10 per month from the date of said battle, February 23, 1847, and that he be enrolled on the pension list from said date, and have his pension audited and allowed from said date, and the arrearages paid to him at once.

The report (by Mr. WILSON of Missouri) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3587) for the relief of Jonathan Ramey, have considered the same and report:

The claimant was a private in Company B, First Kentucky Cavalry, and served from June 6, 1846, to June 7, 1847, in the war with Mexico.

On January 28, 1875, he filed an application for pension, declaring that at Buena Vista, Mexico, on the 23d of February, 1847, his horse fell with him and injured his foot. This claim was rejected by the Pension Bureau, but for what cause does not clearly appear—presumably, however, because the records of the War Department contained no mention of the injury, and the claimant furnished no proof in support of the claim.

Subsequently his name was placed on the pension roll at $8 per month, under the Mexican war survivors' act of January 29, 1887.

In his petition for relief by special act of Congress Mr. Ramey declares that he received the injury above referred to at the battle of Buena Vista, and that the right foot and toes were crushed in such a manner as to cause varicose veins and result in lameness, from which he has suffered ever since.

Matthew F. Minor testifies that he served with the claimant in the Mexican war, and saw him just after the battle of Buena Vista with his right foot so swollen that he could not wear his shoe, and witness understood at the time that the claimant received said injury in the manner heretofore described. Mr. Minor also testified that the claimant is so lame as to necessitate the use of a cane.

James A. Vance and William Clemmons, citizens of Perryville, Ark., testify to an acquaintance of several years with the claimant and know that he has always been lame in right foot and leg, and they have always understood that he received his injuries in the alleged manner. They further testify that he is unable to earn his support by manual labor and that he has no property or income aside from his pension of $8 per month.

Two petitions asking that the relief prayed for may be granted were before your committee. One of these is signed by 234 citizens of Perry County, Ark., and the other, which recites that the claimant has no property of any consequence and is entirely unable to earn a living by reason of age and physical condition, is signed by 65 citizens of the same county and State.

After careful consideration your committee recommend that the bill be passed, amended, however, so as to fix the rate of pension at $20 per month, the same to begin from the date of the passage of the act and to be in lieu of the amount now drawn by the beneficiary.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM F. C. NINDEMANN.

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 7281) granting a pension to William F. C. Nindemann, late of the Jeannette expedition to the Arctic Ocean, be taken out of its regular order and considered at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will send up the bill which the Clerk will report, after which the Chair will ask if there be objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension rolls, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William F. C. Nindemann, late of the United States ship Jeannette, in the expedition to the Arctic Ocean.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the question is, Shall the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation?

Mr. KILGORE. I submit that the report ought to be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the report is of sufficient length to consume the time up to the hour of adjournment.

Mr. KILGORE. Then there should be some statement made respecting the case.

Mr. CLANCY. If the gentleman will permit me, I will make a brief explanation of the bill. In 1873 this man was in the service of the United States.

Mr. KILGORE. In the naval service?

Mr. CLANCY. He was in the naval service and was selected as one of the men who was most competent and fit, because of his physical health and strength, to go on this expedition on the Jeannette to the Arctic Ocean, and all the gentlemen know the history of that expedition. He is now a cripple through having at that time selected to do this work for the Government. Because of his strength he was selected to make a long march in search of relief, and for sixteen days he was on the ice day and night, and slept on it. He and his companion traveled over 1,000 miles. All I ask is that he be allowed to go to the Pension Department to be placed upon the pension roll according to his own grade.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with the recommendation that it do pass.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MARTIN. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. RICHARDSON having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. DOCKERY, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that that committee had had under consideration sundry bills on the Private Calendar, and had directed him to report them to the House with various recommendations.

The first bill reported from the Committee of the Whole was the bill (H. R. 2902) for the relief of David L. Truex.

Mr. MARTIN. I ask unanimous consent that an order be made that the previous question be considered as ordered to the engrossment, third reading, and final passage of each of the bills reported from the Committee of the Whole now before the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MARTIN] asks unanimous consent that the previous question be considered as ordered upon the engrossment and third reading of the several bills with the amendments which have been agreed to in committee, and to include the final passage of the bills. Is there objection?

Mr. KILGORE. I do not think it is competent for the House to order the previous question to that extent all at once. The previous question can be ordered to the engrossment and third reading, and after that is exhausted it can then be ordered on the final passage, and I think that is as far as it is in the power of the House to go.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. On the question of order, the Chair thinks it is competent for the House, by unanimous consent, to agree to an order for the previous question to include the passage of the bills. However, if the gentleman from Texas objects, it will not be done.

Mr. KILGORE. I disagree with the Speaker on that subject, and therefore I will have to follow my convictions and object to the previous question being considered as ordered on the final passage of the bills.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. MARTIN. Then I modify my request so that the previous question may extend to the engrossment and third reading of the bills.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana modifies his request so as to ask unanimous consent that the previous question may be considered as ordered upon the amendments to the several bills, in the order in which they were agreed to by the committee, to include the engrossment and third reading of the several bills. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. MARTIN. I now ask unanimous consent that the previous question be considered as ordered to the final passage of the bill (H. R. 5722) increasing the pension of Meridy Smith, a Revolutionary widow.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana also requests that the previous question be considered as ordered upon, not only the engrossment and third reading, but the final passage of the bill (H. R. 5722) for the relief of a Revolutionary widow. Is there objection?

Mr. KILGORE. If you will include in that order the beneficiary in the bill presented by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CROSBY], the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TERRY] for the relief of Jonathan Ramey, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY], and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MOSES], I will agree to it. Those four bills.

Mr. MARTIN. I hope there will be no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana will please state the numbers and titles of the bills.

Mr. MARTIN. The bills are: the bill (H. R. 2073) pensioning Mrs. Jane Y. Wade; the bill (H. R. 5209) for the relief of Betsey Worthington; the bill (H. R. 5722) increasing the pension of Meridy Smith, a Revolutionary pensioner; and the bill (H. R. 3587) for the relief of Jonathan Ramey, a Mexican war veteran.

Mr. CLANCY. I ask to have the bill (H. R. 7281) granting a pension to William F. C. Nindemann, of the Jeannette expedition to the Arctic Ocean, included in that order.

Mr. MARTIN. I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request made that the previous question be considered upon the final passage of these bills?

Mr. KILGORE. With the right of debate under the rules. Some one may want to debate the bills.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman had better state the length of time to which the debate shall be limited.

Mr. MARTIN. Let it be limited to fifteen minutes on each side.

Mr. WILSON of Missouri. I ask the same upon the bills 344, 345, 346 on the Calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will remind gentlemen that the hour for the adjournment of the House will arrive in a few moments. The question before the House is, Shall the previous question be considered as ordered on the final passage of the five bills named, with the right of fifteen minutes' debate on each side? Is there objection to the request? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The hour of 10 o'clock and 30 minutes having arrived, the Chair declares the House adjourned until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

INTERNATIONAL MONETARY CONFERENCE.

Mr. TELLER. I submit a resolution, and ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the President be, and is hereby, requested to inform the Senate what steps, if any, have been taken towards the securing of an international conference to consider the question of free coinage of silver at the mints of the nations participating in such conference, or as to the enlarged use of silver in the currency system of said countries; and that he is also hereby requested to transmit to the Senate copies of all correspondence between the United States Government and the governments expected to participate in the proceedings of such international conference, if any such correspondence has been had.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection if the usual clause is inserted, which is always done in resolutions addressed to the President, "if not incompatible with the public interest."

Mr. TELLER. I have no objection to those words being put in, but I can not see how it can be possible that a disclosure of what has occurred could be incompatible with the public interest. However, let those words be put in.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is the usual language always adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado modifies his resolution, and the modification thereof will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the first line, after the word "requested," insert the words "if not incompatible with the public interest;" so as to read:

Resolved, That the President be, and is hereby, requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to inform the Senate, etc.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

INQUIRY CONCERNING RAILWAYS.

Resolved, That a special committee of the Senate shall be, and is hereby, created, to consist of nine members, chosen by resolution of the Senate, who shall be charged with the duty of inquiring into and reporting to the Senate the present value per mile of the railways of the United States; also the present capitalization of the same, and the difference, if any, between the capitalization and the actual cost of construction and equipment of said railways; also to inquire and report to the Senate the gross and net receipts of all and each of the railway companies in the United States; the number of employees and the compensation paid to each; the amount of the bonded indebtedness; the amount of its outstanding capital stock; the kind and value of all property, whether money, stocks, and bonds, or real and personal estate; the names and residence and amount of stock or bonds held by each stockholder or bondholder of each and all of such railroads.

That the committee shall have power to send for persons and papers and to compel their attendance, and to employ a clerk and stenographer.

That the committee shall also inquire and report to the Senate whether any of said railway companies, their stockholders or bondholders, agents or employees have used or attempted to use their corporate privileges or powers, or money, to influence and control the elections of members of Congress or the members of the State Legislatures.

Mr. CALL. I ask that the resolution may be printed and lie on the table, to be called up hereafter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

Mr. MORGAN. I suggest an amendment which I hope the Senator from Florida will concur in and put in the resolution; that in reporting the amount of stocks and bonds issued by railroad corporations the committee will also report whether they are held in the United States or held abroad, and at what rates of interest.

Mr. CALL. I accept the modification. I ask that the resolution may be modified in that form.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The modification of the resolution suggested by the Senator from Alabama, and adopted by the Senator from Florida, will be made and the resolution will be printed and lie over.

The Chief Clerk will report the modification.

The CHIEF CLERK. Add to the resolution the following words:

EXCLUSION OF CHINESE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there further morning business? If not, the Calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business. I believe that was the understanding, so that we may have the full day on it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business, which is the bill (H. R. 6185) to absolutely prohibit the coming of Chinese persons into the United States.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill, the pending question being on the amendment in the nature of a substitute reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I do not intend to debate the merits of the bill. That has been done by several Senators who agree with the action of the committee. I only rise because yesterday I made a statement of what I understood to be the well-established rule of international law, which seems to have been questioned by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER], and perhaps by others. I desire to say that, whatever may be our relations with China, I do not think there can be any dispute as to what the law on the subject touching the rejection of a minister whom we proffer to China is. I understand it to be an elementary principle that a minister serves as such with the consent of both nations, and both nations must consent before he can be a minister. He must be received as well as sent. I have myself been unable to find any case (and my attention has been called to this matter on several occasions) where it has been considered offensive for a nation to reject a minister sent to it. I find the authorities to be uniform on the subject that the nation to whom he is sent is to judge for itself. The nation to whom the ambassador or minister is accredited is not required to give any reasons why the minister is not acceptable. As stated by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS] so well yesterday, all it has to do is to say that it does not want him.

Mr. Fish, Secretary of State during the administration of General Grant, declared that not only a nation was not required to give a reason for the rejection of a minister or for his recall, but that no self-respecting nation would do it. So if the Chinese Government rejected Minister Blair, or refused to receive him, it is not a ground of complaint here, and our legislation should proceed exactly as if it had accepted that minister.

But it is said that the Chinese Government gave reasons why it would not receive him and that those reasons were untenable. There is nothing in that. It was not required to give any reasons. If it gave reasons that were not sufficient, it still was left with the unquestioned right to fall back and say, by giving no reason if it chose, it would not receive the minister.

I have taken a little pains to look up this subject since it was called up. I do not intend to take more than a moment or two on this point. I just want to call attention to the authorities:

Every foreign agent depends upon the double will of the two Governments—of that which sends him, and of that which is to permit the exercise of his functions within its territory—and when either of these wills is refused or withdrawn his authority to act within that territory becomes incomplete.

That is the language of Mr. Jefferson, Secretary of State, to the minister of France, and that was touching the conduct of a minister who had been received, but the principle as laid down is the same. I find later this declaration:

No instance is recollected of one power pressing another equally independent to recognize against its will a minister to whom objections of a personal nature are entertained.

That is Mr. Monroe, Secretary of State, to Mr. Onís, in 1815. I find also the following:

A minister from a foreign sovereign will not be received when there are personal objections to him, and when the nomination is forced, not as a matter of courtesy, but in defiance of such objections.

That is Mr. Dallas, Acting Secretary of State, to Mr. Onís, in June, 1815.

It must be borne in mind that an envoy is a person as well as the abstract representative of his government, and that it is the prerogative of every government to require that those with whom it deals be personæ græ, and to decide the question for itself. This Government has on several occasions availed itself of this personal right, without thereby being supposed to reflect on the representative character of the person himself, and still less upon the collective representative character of his associates.

That is Mr. Frelinghuysen, Secretary of State, to Mr. Morgan, in 1884. There are quite a number of cases where ministers have been recalled, and the same rule, I understand, prevails exactly as when the minister is not received.

Every government has the right to have the representative of another power an acceptable person, and no government has the right to expect of another the retention of a representative who indulges in personal abuse of the head of the government to which he is accredited, as Mr. Catacazy has done.

This is Mr. Fish, Secretary of State, to Mr. Curtin. This is what he referred to, and this is laid down as the general rule:

The declaration of the authorized representative of the power to which an offending minister is accredited is all that can properly be asked, and all that a self-respecting power could give.

I think it must be admitted that we have no ground of complaint against China because Senator Blair was rejected as minister. They had a right to reject him on absolutely false premises or without any whatever.

I wish to say just a word about the abrogation of treaties, and I shall not dwell on that point, because I understand that the Senator from Oregon who sits on my left [Mr. MITCHELL], who made a few years ago a very able presentation of the law on that point, will probably say something on the subject now. I understand the rule to be exactly as I laid it down yesterday. Every nation that treats with another treats with the understanding that that nation may retire from the treaty at any time it sees fit, and it may do that notwithstanding there is a provision in the treaty that it shall continue for a limited period of time. All treaties that are not stipulated to expire at a particular time, unless in the very nature of the circumstances surrounding which they treat, are for unlimited periods. A stipulation that a treaty shall remain in force five years or ten may be annulled by either of the contracting parties at will.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] says when that is done the country must take the responsibility. That is true; there is no doubt about that. There might be such a condition of affairs that the abrogation of one section of a treaty, or the whole treaty by one nation without conferring and consulting with the other might be very offensive, and it is possible out of that might grow complications very important and sometimes very disastrous; but the rule remains just as I have stated it, that legislation in this country by the national legislative body will set aside any treaty inconsistent with the provisions of that enactment, whether it was intended so to be done or not.

In the Cherokee Tobacco Case, which has been mentioned, the Supreme Court fairly decided that doctrine, where there was no reason to suppose that the legislative branch of the Government intended to set aside the treaty, but did in fact by the enactment of a law that was entirely inconsistent with the provisions of the treaty; and that is certainly true when the legislative department of the Government purposely abrogates a provision of a treaty.

The Senator from New Hampshire seemed to think that the terms "abrogate" and "repeal" are synonymous with "violation." To abrogate a treaty, or to repeal a treaty, is a legal right which is always presumptive of a moral right. The violation of a treaty is presumptive of wrong. A treaty should be enforced while it remains, and repealed or abrogated whenever it is improper or contrary to the interests of the nation to enforce or to maintain its provisions.

Mr. President, I do not need to speak to any extent of the merits of this bill. The bill as it comes here from the other House may be, and doubtless is, exceedingly harsh in its provisions; but there is one thing certain, that the public sentiment in this country demands the exclusion of this class of people from the United States, or, in other words, if not the exclusion of those who are here the exclusion of those who may seek to come. I remember very well some ten or twelve years ago, perhaps ten, when this question was presented to the Senate for the first time—

Mr. DAWES. In 1882.

Mr. TELLER. In 1882, some Senator says. I do not recall the exact time. I remember there was a very determined opposition to the bill, based upon the high ground that this country is the asylum and the refuge and the home of all peoples. We who favored then the restriction of the Chinese maintained, as we maintain now, that the exclusion of the Chinese from this country is no violation of that well-established and honored rule. We also maintained that rigid and strict rules may be enacted touching the immigration of people not of the same class as the Chinese, if we saw fit. The question of the immigration of a class of people who are entirely different from ours, a class of people with whom we can have no social relations and with whom our people can not and will not amalgamate, presents, in my judgment, a very different question from that which is presented even when we come to consider the undesirable immigration of persons from foreign countries who are of our family.

We can assimilate with the most objectionable classes that come here from Europe; they become in a few years a part and parcel of the American citizenship, and we shall find in one or two generations at most a homogeneous people in language, in sympathy, in feeling, and in taste, possibly not altogether in religion; but in all those things that go to make a harmonious people and that induce coherence and peace within the borders of a nation, there will be no distinction between the children of the immigrant of to-day and the children of the immigrant of 200 years ago.

Mr. MORRILL. May I ask the Senator from Colorado a question before he leaves that subject?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. MORRILL. I am inclined to believe that Congress has the power to pass a law which would supersede a treaty, but now I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado whether he thinks other nations have the same power?

Mr. TELLER. Oh, Mr. President, I thought I stated explicitly that all nations have that power.

Mr. MORRILL. Then, I should like to ask the Senator whether Japan can repeal the treaties which are existing between it and several other nations, especially with England, in relation to the duties on imports?

Mr. MITCHELL. We have done it over and over again.

Mr. TELLER. I should have a very poor opinion of a nation which would surrender that right, and I do not believe that the Japanese nation, or even the Chinese, have ever surrendered any right of that character. I have no doubt that any treaty may be retired from.

Mr. MORRILL. Japan has endeavored to secure a release from her treaty from Great Britain for years, and has not succeeded.

Mr. TELLER. Very well, Mr. President, Japan may not be willing to abrogate the treaty, and thus, perhaps, create friction and complaint in Great Britain, not of a legal character, but of another character. We have been trying to get rid of a treaty with Great Britain for a great many years, too, and a great many people in this country believe we got rid of the treaty by the action of Great Britain in violating it.

There has never been quite such a condition of affairs that anybody wanted to propose the absolute repeal or abrogation of that treaty—I refer to the Bulwer-Clayton treaty—and yet neither the United States nor Great Britain, I think, is to the highest extent respecting the terms of that treaty. It is very evident that the people of the United States would insist upon the abrogation of that treaty whenever it should appear that it was inimical to the interests of the great masses of the people of this country.

We shall never assimilate with the Chinese; we never shall assimilate with them, because even if we would they will not.

I listened with great interest to the very able speech of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS] when he spoke of these people, of their great civilization, their great age, their great wealth, and their great numbers. They are a very wonderful people, and perhaps the most wonderful thing about the Chinese people is that practically they are to-day where they were a thousand or two thousand years ago, and that to the Chinaman is the highest possible evidence of his superiority over all other men. In the whole catalogue of nations there is no nation that is so thoroughly satisfied with itself and its surroundings as the Chinese. Their civilization to them is infinitely superior to the civilization of Europe and America. They believe that their scholastic attainments are infinitely greater and better than the scholastic attainments of any other people in the world, and they are as unchangeable now in this, the last of the nineteenth century, as they were when they were first touched and we first learned of them through Marco Polo, of whom the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations [Mr. SHERMAN] spoke a few days since. They will, in contact with the civilization of Europe and America, remain Chinese, and so a reason exists for keeping them out of our country that exists for keeping out of the country no other class of people who desire to come here.

The Senator from Minnesota said that Chinamen did not come here to remain, but they came here with the intent to return. That is the objectionable feature of this immigration; it is objectionable because they come here simply to take money out of the country and return to their homes. They take no part in building up the society in which they live. The lowest immigrant who comes from Europe, whether he be a convict, pauper, or otherwise, comes here and contributes something to civilized society; he puts his children in school, and the great mass of them contribute materially to the prosperity of this country, but China contributes simply what is contributed in any country by cheap labor. The Chinaman comes in competition with the American laborer and deprives him of opportunities. While the Chinese laborer is absolved from all obligation to society whatever, the American citizen is compelled to bear all the burdens of society. The Chinaman can work for 50 cents a day and lay up money; the American citizen can not maintain his family on twice that, because he must educate his children; he must pay his part of the taxes; he must support the church and the State and the Chinaman does neither.

Mr. President, I am in favor of a restricted immigration of all classes of people to this country. I confess that if it were left to me to determine how that should be done, I should be unable to arrive at any plan which would be acceptable to myself. Of the five or six hundred thousand people who come to us from abroad every year, eight-tenths of them at least will make desirable citizens. They come here with some degree of wealth, and promote the industries and interests of this whole nation.

It is said that it costs a thousand dollars to raise a man to manhood. These men come here with that expense having been incurred, and if they bring nothing but their person and their power to earn money and their willingness to support society, as they do, they have brought at least a thousand dollars for each one who comes, which enters into and becomes a part of the profit that we are making in the industrial pursuits of this country. The Chinaman does not do that, because whatever may be the profits that he makes here, he retires with them whenever he gets through and takes them away.

While the Chinaman is objectionable, and the legislation in relation to him ought to go upon the theory that he is to be excluded, I do not myself think that we can afford to pass harsh and unreasonable laws. The Chinese who come here with our consent are entitled to the rights of domicile; they are entitled to the protection of the law, and there is no way that I know of, without an infraction, if not of a law, at least of the decencies which should be shown from one nation to another, by which we can compel those within our borders to retire; but we have an unquestioned right to say that no more shall come, and we may say that no class shall come; we may say that the merchant and the scientist shall remain away. It may not be proper to do that; that is to say, it may be bad policy to do that; but our right to do it nobody can deny.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] spoke of the trade that we were having with China. Why, Mr. President, the trade of the United States with China is so insignificant that it can not be brought here as an argument at all. How much is our trade with China? We buy of China about three times as much as China buys of us. It is true, as the Senator said, they take some of our silver, an inconsequential amount. In ten years they have taken from England $26,000,000 of silver, and from us they take anywhere from a million and a half to five millions per annum. So our commercial relations with China are of no great value.

The Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] said it was now believed that we had in China a great market for manufactured goods. Last year our trade with China was not one-half what it was a few years ago—I mean our exports of cotton cloths and things of that character. I have the statistics here before me. In 1889 we sent 118,000,000 yards of cotton cloth to China; in 1890 we sent a little over 80,000,000 yards of cotton cloth to China—

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the figures which the Senator gives are slightly mistaken in this respect. A portion of the trade with China goes through English channels; it nearly all goes that way, and nearly all the imports are brought in in that way, except tea, which is brought in direct.

Mr. TELLER. I am talking of our trade. If we should get into difficulty with China, I suppose England would still buy goods of China and sell them to us. That great trading nation will hardly stop buying goods of China and bringing them to us because we are in difficulty with China.

In 1885 our exports of merchandise to China were $10,530,000; in 1886, $11,562,000; in 1889, $6,466,000; and in 1890, a little over $5,000,000; so that since 1885 we have lost practically one-half of our export trade with China.

Mr. President, I do not intend to intrude a silver debate into the Chinese bill, except to say that while China remains on a silver basis and the United States is for all practical purposes of trade and commerce on a gold basis our trade will gradually run down and finally cease.

India sent last year into China more than £13,000,000 in value of goods, against ours of a trifle more than $5,000,000, and that was fully explained the other day when I read the statement by Mr. Felton, a manufacturer of Manchester, England, who said when they sent a bale of yarn down there they received for it 4s. 6d., and when they had converted it into English money it was 3s. 1d. When we send our goods to China and exchange them for silver, as we are compelled to do, unless we exchange them for tea, when we bring back the silver and convert it into gold we have lost on the transaction, while the merchant of India finds his silver with the same purchasing power that it ever had.

I find that our trade with Asia is practically nil. I find that India has a trade with Asia of more than £24,000,000 sterling, a trade which has been built up practically since the demonetization of silver here in 1873, and if our manufacturers ever expect to send manufactured goods to China it will only be when some different system of finance has been adopted in this country.

Mr. President, I would not favor harsh and unfair legislation because we do not trade with China, nor would I release or remit one iota of what is right and proper when we come to deal with those people with reference to their exclusion because of the trade with China, whether it is great or whether it is small.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I do not rise to protract this debate. I have discussed this question so often that my views are well understood and I believe they are now in harmony with those of nearly all the thinking people of the United States. There was a time when there was a great diversity of opinion on the question of Chinese immigration to this country, but I think there is practically none now. The American people are now convinced that the Chinese can not be incorporated among our citizens, can not be amalgamated, can not be absorbed, but that they will remain a distinct element, and in this country they will simply be a servile and disturbing element, interfering with our labor system, taking the labor from our people, and interfering with our whole social system. Where they are, you can not have American civilization. Churches, schools, and everything which pertains to American civilization disappear before their civilization, and when they come in sufficient numbers our race must disappear before them. That is our experience.

The attention of the country has been recently called to immigration from Europe, and there is a pretty settled purpose now to exclude all foreigners who can not be incorporated into the body politic; all who are criminals or paupers or diseased in any way. There is more attention now being paid to that subject than ever before. We must do it for self-preservation and for the protection of our laboring people. The attention of the East is called to that question, and there is a pretty uniform sentiment that while the immigration from Europe of good people is still desirable, and that they can still add to our prosperity and we welcome them here, yet in that immigration we have to be more cautious and circumspect than we have been heretofore.

There is a disposition on the part of many countries in Europe to unload their paupers and criminals upon us. Transportation has become so cheap that that is an easy way to get rid of undesirable classes, and we find a disposition to flood us with that element. The attention of Congress is called to it, and there is a general disposition to prevent the importation of paupers and criminals from Europe.

As to the Chinese, they have many qualities which commend them to us. They are industrious, they are frugal, they can live on very little; but they come in severe competition with our people. They do not bring their families. They perhaps present to us a more immoral condition than they would if they had their families and the surroundings which they have at home; but in this country, where they get together in towns, they foster an immoral element, which is very prejudicial to the good order of society. Anyone who visits San Francisco, goes through their quarters, and sees how they live, will be shocked with the condition of things there; and where they are in considerable numbers white labor is excluded, at least that is the case in California and the other States on the Pacific coast. We would have had, I doubt not, nearly double the population there now of white American citizens if it had not been for competition with this race, with whom our laborers can not compete, who live on less, and whose society is such that it absolutely excludes the whites.

I do not wish to put anything in the bill that shall be unnecessarily harsh, for I have no unkindly feeling toward the Chinese, and our people have none, but we want a bill sufficiently guarded that will accomplish the purpose and exclude them. This seems to me a necessity. The Chinese are a very shrewd people, and resort to many devices which are cunning to evade our laws; and that creates the necessity for additional safeguards.

I rose, however, more for the purpose of expressing my gratification that the country had come to understand the question, and that it is now adopting sufficient means to accomplish the purpose. The country has come to the conclusion that we can not encourage these people to come among us; that their presence is destructive to our form of civilization, and that we do not want them. We do not want to do anything cruel or harsh to them, nor make our laws any more severe than is necessary to keep them away from our shores. We have to do that.

I believe we should have an American policy that, while we welcome good people of all countries of our own race who can amalgamate with us and become a part of the body politic, hereafter there shall be more energy devoted to exclude the undesirable classes. They are already crowding our laborers who are struggling for support in this country, when they are brought here in large numbers and forced into our industries. It is a matter which the principles of ordinary self-preservation require that additional attention should be given to. I am glad that the Committee on Immigration is investigating these subjects thoroughly, and I believe that we shall work out a system which will protect our people from this invasion. But so far as the Chinese are concerned there is no way of assorting them. The coolies are all of the same class, and if they are allowed to come here at all they will produce incalculable harm to our people and to our country.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. President, since the commencement of the first agitation of the exclusion of Chinese laborers, I certainly have favored that policy, and, I believe, in the other end of the Capitol I gave my assent by my vote to a bill providing for the exclusion of Chinese.

I am not in favor of the violation of treaty obligations with China or with any other nation until diplomacy has exhausted itself in efforts for the amendment of our treaties. In this connection, I propose to say a word or two in respect to the violation of our treaty obligations with China by the law of 1888. There was a violation of the treaty of 1880 by that act. How serious was it? Bear in mind that it was a separate treaty, or a treaty having respect only to the immigration of Chinese here.

The treaty provided that teachers, students, merchants, Chinese, who from curiosity desired to come here with their body and household servants, should have the liberty to do so. It was then provided that Chinese residents here at that time should have the right to go to China and return at their pleasure. Eight years after the last provision to which I have referred was withdrawn from by the Government of the United States by a law. This occurred eight years after the treaty was entered into, and I remember very well that it was an element in the discussion of that law at that time that after the lapse of eight years, taking into account the Chinamen who must have died or must have returned to permanently remain in China, there could be but very few who would desire to avail themselves of the right to return here under that treaty obligation.

It was true that the Chinese population had increased here in those eight years and that it certainly had not increased by the birth of Chinese here. It was therefore obvious that the evidence upon which a Chinaman could return here was practically negotiable, and that frauds were being perpetrated by Chinese laborers upon the law which was then in force and upon the treaty. The result was, taking into account the frauds to which I have referred and taking into account the small number of Chinamen who had the right or could choose to exercise the right to go hence to China and return here, that it was no very serious violation of the treaty to pass that law.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. HISCOCK. I will.

Mr. MITCHELL. The provisions of that act applied to every Chinese laborer in the United States.

Mr. HISCOCK. I know it did.

Mr. MITCHELL. So that from and after the passage of that act it became impossible, under its provisions, if any Chinese laborer then in the United States left the United States for him to return.

Mr. HISCOCK. I understand that, bear in mind—I call the Senator's attention to it—by the treaty obligation we entered into in 1880 Chinese laborers who are now in the United States were to be allowed to go and come of their own free will. It was supposed that a large proportion of the Chinese population here in 1888 were here in fraud of that treaty and the legislation of Congress. We do not differ about the facts. We had the right to prohibit by law Chinese immigration here of others than those who were here when this treaty was made, and we did prohibit it. The act which was passed subsequent to this Chinese treaty did prohibit Chinese laborers from coming here, unless they were here when this treaty was entered into and had returned to China and desired to come back.

What is the violation of the treaty proposed by the bill reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations? We have the right to prohibit the importation or immigration here under that treaty of all Chinamen who were not domiciled here on the 17th day of November, 1880. Nearly twelve years have passed since that treaty was negotiated, and how many Chinamen do Senators suppose there are who desire to avail themselves of the privileges reserved to them under the treaty of 1880, twelve years since it was agreed to by the two governments? The number must have been reduced very largely, and yet it is true that the Chinese population here has increased. Technically, it would be a violation of treaty obligation, I suppose, on the face of the law if fifty years hence Congress should pass a law that no Chinese laborer should come to this country or should suspend their coming here for a certain period of time; and yet we understand that at that time there would not be in existence probably a Chinaman who could avail himself of the treaty stipulation of 1880.

Mr. MITCHELL. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. HISCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am not quite sure that I understand him on another point. Do I understand the Senator to say that Congress has a right to inhibit the return to this country, under penalties, of any Chinese who were here prior to the adoption of the treaty of 1880 without transgressing the provisions of that treaty?

Mr. HISCOCK. No; I do not say it has not got the power to do it. What I am trying to demonstrate is that when we pass a law which does prohibit the return here of Chinamen who were residents of the United States, who were domiciled in the United States on the 17th day of November, 1880, it can affect but a very few people, and can not be a very serious matter as between the two high contracting parties.

Mr. MITCHELL. Why?

Mr. HISCOCK. Simply because the application of the law is to a very few Chinamen indeed. Therefore, I made the illustration on that it might be in terms a violation of treaty obligations if fifty years from now we should pass a law prohibiting all Chinese laborers from coming here. It might be in violation of the treaty stipulation in terms, and yet we know that practically the law could not affect a single living Chinaman.

What does the substitute reported by the committee provide? It continues the violation of the treaty which was first violated by the Scott law, and yet in the four years which have elapsed since the passage of that bill, by the laws of nature the number of persons have been constantly decreasing to whom the law could apply or from whom it could take any right under the treaty. What I am arguing is that, after the lapse of twelve years from the enactment of the treaty, there can be but a very few Chinamen who were domiciled here then who can be affected by the law which we may pass.

I was about to refer to the bill reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations. It does not extend prohibition of immigration or suspension of immigration beyond the provision of the law of 1888, but it does this, which it seems to me that everyone opposed to Chinese immigration should be satisfied with: Under its provisions a Chinese laborer here, against whom we would guard the country and our civilization, is presumptively here in violation of law; certificates that such persons were here in 1880 have been abrogated; a Chinese laborer has no right here, and the burden of proof, at least, is thrown upon him. I said he had no right here; the burden of proof is thrown upon him to establish his right to be here, and if he fails to establish it affirmatively he is exported from the country.

The passage of this measure must, in my judgment, of necessity result in a practical banishment from the Pacific States of the Chinese laborers; that is, if the people of California, of Oregon, and the other Chinese States see fit, or if there is anyone member of any of those States who sees fit to prosecute the Chinaman under the provisions of this act, he can drive the whole race, or all the members of the race who are here, if they are laborers, from our shores. Is not that severe enough? Is not that remedy enough if enforced, against our being troubled with Chinese laborers in this country?

Now, I desire to call attention to what the House bill proposes. When the treaty of 1858 was entered into our ports were free to the citizens of every nation on earth. There was no inhibition against Chinamen, and they could come here freely. With that condition of things we made a treaty with China, and she had the right to regard that law or the condition of things existing at that time as a part of the treaty. The treaty was founded upon the condition of things which existed then; it was founded upon the rights which Chinese might enjoy under our laws to immigrate to this country, and I say that when we pass a law which restricts the rights and privileges which American citizens gained under the treaty, and which the Chinese at that time enjoyed under our law, we virtually violate the treaty of 1858.

Let us look at it for a moment. There was an article in that treaty in regard to the privileges of United States vessels in Chinese waters. Certain privileges were conceded to this Government by the Chinese Government. They had all the privileges conceded to us in our waters if they chose to exercise them. It is true they never have exercised them, but practically in respect to the rights which our vessels have in their waters, if China chooses that such should be the case, we abrogate the treaty of 1858.

Article 11 is in respect to the privileges of United States citizens in China, not laborers, but our travelers, our teachers, our missionaries, our merchants. Under our law all that China gave us by article 11 her citizens might enjoy in the United States. They conceded the right, enumerated in that article to our citizens, and when we practically withdraw by law from China the right of her citizens to come here, excepting laborers, it is a practical suspension and abrogation if China chooses to treat it so of the provisions of article 11 of the treaty of 1858, a valuable concession.

Article 12 is in respect to the privileges of citizens of the United States residing at open ports in relation to trade. There again Chinese merchants had all the rights they conceded to American citizens.

Rights in respect to our shipwrecked vessels were conceded to us by article 13. Of course, Chinese vessels do not come to the United States, but they have the right to come under our law. Practically that concession to them was written in this treaty, and yet we propose to abrogate it. Certain ports were designated which our citizens might enter for the purposes of trade and to reside with their families. To the Chinese our ports were free. It was again practically written in this treaty that they should have the right to come to our country and engage in commerce with our people at all our ports.

Article 15 is in respect to commerce and tonnage duties—

Mr. GRAY. I will ask the Senator what he is reading from now?

Mr. HISCOCK. I am reading from the treaty of 1858. I will read a clause of article 16.

Collectors of customs at the open ports shall consult with the consuls about the erection of beacons or light-houses, and where buoys and light-ships should be placed.

That was far more than we had conceded to them by our laws.

Article 17 refers to pilots and servants and teachers.

Article 18 is in respect of the duties of custom-house officers, enacting provisions in respect to mutineers and deserters and by that article providing that an asylum should not be granted, however, to Chinese criminals.

There are other articles of the treaty in respect to customs, the right of citizens of the United States to reexport articles, a provision in respect to tonnage and customs duties, the transshipment of goods, in respect to the collection of debts, in regard to the treatment of United States vessels in the time of war between China and other powers; a jurisdiction in respect to the rights of property in persons was provided and provision made for communication between citizens of the United States and Chinese local officers; religious freedom which Chinamen enjoyed here was granted to American citizens there.

Now, I say that in respect to all these matters to which I have referred, the passage of the House bill into law would be a practical abrogation of the treaty. In respect to laborers there is now a separate treaty, which, under the provisions of the Senate substitute, in my judgment, in effect would not be very seriously violated; but what I argue is, that when a treaty is entered into between two nations and concessions are made by the one to the other, the law of the other at that time covering those concessions in respect to immigration there, practically the law in existence in the more liberal government, is incorporated into the treaty, at least the treaty is to be construed with reference to the law existing in the country having the more liberal policy than that of the government making concessions.

However, I did not rise to discuss this bill at any very great length. I did desire to do what I have done, point out practically the extent to which we are violating the treaty of 1880 by the Senate bill, demonstrating, as I believe I have, that in respect to Chinese subjects, with a decrease in twelve years of the number whose rights under that treaty might be violated, pointing out the limitations of the violation of the treaty and showing really how inconsequential they are and then, to point out beyond that, the extreme violation which we should perpetrate if we should pass the House bill.

I do not understand that Senators complain that because of the immigration to this country, the coming to this country—I will withdraw the word "immigration"—the coming to this country temporarily of other than the laboring classes, the destiny of the United States is to change, that our civilization is to be destroyed, that the Asiatic hordes are to dominate us. They do not claim that. I do not understand that they claim that the laboring classes of our country will be imperiled if those outside of the laboring classes enumerated in the treaty of 1880 are permitted to freely come here. Who are they?

Chinese subjects, whether proceeding to the United States as teachers, students, merchants, or from curiosity, together with their body and household servants.

Those are the classes which, if we pass the Senate substitute, will still be permitted to come here. Is there any peril to our advancing civilization by that right being continued? The objection does not come from merchants, the objection does not come from teachers, it does not come from those in this country who fear that there may be a vast immigration here of curiosity-seekers or those traveling for curiosity; and I have failed to hear anyone in the discussion of this question advocate or advance the idea that there is peril in our confining our legislation to Chinese laborers alone. Certainly, under the strict provisions incorporated into the Senate substitute, casting upon the Chinaman here the burden of proof to establish his right to be here—

Mr. FELTON. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. HISCOCK. Let me add that I do not believe that the civilization of California is threatened, that the merchants of California are threatened, and that there is really any peril to the citizens of that State.

Mr. FELTON. Will the Senator permit me to say that that is a matter of opinion? I understood the Senator to say that he had heard no complaint with regard to the admission of anybody except laborers. The objection which I have been trying to make and have the Senator understand is that through the inefficiency of the present laws, the coolie class, the laboring class, the lower class, the class who come here under contract, almost invariably by reason of the merchants' clause, assuming that disguise, are filling up the country, and that should be prevented.

Mr. HISCOCK. As I understand now from the Senator, if the Chinese laborers can be prohibited, he is satisfied; but he believes that under the laws at present in force there is an invasion, a fraud perpetrated by the Chinamen and that they come here under the merchant clause as traders, as teachers, and it is desired to provide against that. I call his attention again to the provisions of the Senate substitute that the burden of proof is thrown upon the Chinaman to prove that he is in one of those excepted classes which have the right to come here.

Mr. FELTON. I will answer the Senator by saying that when a Chinaman is once in the country, I defy him or anyone else to identify him and determine under which class he came.

Mr. HISCOCK. I ask the Senator to wait a moment. He need not throw his defiance at me. It is for the Chinaman to prove to what class he belongs. Bear in mind it is not for me and it is not for the Senator or his constituents to prove the class to which the Chinaman belongs. His being here is presumed to be in violation of law, and the burden of proof is thrown upon him to establish his right to be here. When you shift the burden of proof, as it is in this bill, I believe if the people of California choose to enforce the provisions of the law the effect will be an exodus of Chinamen from the shores of the United States.

Mr. FELTON. I should like to have the Senator state how the means are to be obtained of getting at the class to which these people belong.

Mr. HISCOCK. I reply to the Senator that the citizens of California are not to furnish the means. Oh, no; the Chinaman must himself, affirmatively establish his right before the officers of his State, men subject to the weaknesses of human nature and doubtless not in sympathy with the immigration of Chinamen here. The officers of his State have it devolved upon them to be satisfied with the affirmative proof of the Chinese immigrant here that he does not belong to the inhibited class of laborers. The question of his employment is open, what he is doing, and he must establish by that, by his domicile, how he lives. He is to be subjected, he and his witnesses, to a searching investigation to prove that he is not a Chinese workingman.

Mr. FELTON. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DUBOIS in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. HISCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. FELTON. The Senator has been very courteous to me, and I exceedingly dislike to interrupt him so often, but I should like in connection with what he has just said to observe simply that there are probably a hundred thousand Chinese upon the Pacific coast, more or less, and I think there are 75,000 of them in California alone—

Mr. HISCOCK. What do they do?

Mr. FELTON. Everything.

Mr. HISCOCK. Laborers?

Mr. FELTON. Yes; and they do everything. Now, I ask the Senator if he thinks it possible to arraign every one of those 75,000 before the court to determine when and how they got here?

Mr. HISCOCK. Why not?

Mr. FELTON. We have not courts enough for that.

Mr. HISCOCK. I reply, yes, sir; certainly.

Mr. FELTON. I reply that it is impossible to do it.

Mr. HISCOCK. Why? The municipal authorities of the city of San Francisco, of any other city, the county officials of every county in that State, if there is in his State existing the sentiment that I suppose does exist against Chinese laborers residing here, will make it their business, I have not the slightest doubt in the world of it, and when a few examples have been made these people will take their flight from our shores.

What next in respect to the Senate bill which I think should satisfy the Senator? The difficulty that has heretofore existed has been that the law practically provided little more than to keep them out. We go further than that now. If found here the Government is to put them out.

Mr. FELTON. When the Government can find out whether they are entitled to be here or not.

Mr. HISCOCK. Again I call the Senator's attention to the fact that that is not the Government's inquiry.

Mr. FELTON. Then I will reply we shall want all the attorneys and the courts that there are in the whole country to accomplish this.

Mr. HISCOCK. I do not know about that. It does not look to me like a very serious matter.

Mr. FELTON. It is because the Senator is not familiar with it.

Mr. HISCOCK. In the State in which I reside and have the honor in part to represent, if there were 75,000 men of an alien race, contrary to the provisions of the law and with the burden of proof thrown upon them to prove their right to be here, they would witness but few rising and setting suns in that State. If public opinion justified the execution of the law, it would be executed summarily. Bear in mind that this is a summary provision. These people are not to be indicted and tried. A summary examination disposes of them. If there was a public sentiment to justify the execution of that law they would be speedily banished from that State, as I have no doubt they will be from the State of California.

Mr. FELTON. I should like to ask the Senator one more question; if in the case of 75,000 people he would have the entire lot arrested when he could by another system simply arrest those who are not entitled to be here?

Mr. HISCOCK. In the first place, you may limit your arrests under the Senate bill to the same extent to which you would exercise it under the House bill. So far as the immigration to this country is concerned, once here, in my judgment this proposed law is as efficacious as the other measure in providing for their return. I say to the Senator again, that 75,000 people who are believed to be a blight upon society, a curse to your State—what is the population of California?

Mr. FELTON. One million two hundred thousand.

Mr. HISCOCK. Among 1,200,000 people would speedily be driven from them and sent abroad.

Mr. FELTON. So they will be, I will tell the Senator, whenever we have a law that will permit it.

Mr. HISCOCK. I say to the Senator in reply to that, and I do not care to prolong the discussion so far as I am concerned, the bill of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations provides ample remedies for them. The bill of the House goes further than that, and in my judgment nullifies the provisions of other treaties that it is for the interest of American citizens should be continued in force. The Senator has been kind and I will not interrupt him further.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I am reluctant to enter into this discussion or to delay the action of the Senate even for a moment upon this very important bill, but as the proposed substitute comes from a committee of which I am a member and meets my entire concurrence, I think it is my duty to make some statement of the grounds upon which I predicate my support of the substitute reported by the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations.

I think that the real merit and essence of the attitude of the two Governments towards each other upon this question of immigration and immigration of citizens of the respective countries is perhaps overlooked in coming to a solution of this question. We started out in 1868 with this very strong declaration in the Burlingame treaty, as it is called:

ARTICLE V.

The United States of America and the Emperor of China cordially recognize the inherent and inalienable right of man to change his home and allegiance, and also the mutual advantage of the free migration and emigration of their citizens and subjects respectively from the one country to the other for the purposes of curiosity or trade, or as permanent residents. The high contracting parties therefore join in reprobating any other than an entirely voluntary emigration for these purposes. They consequently agree to pass laws making it a penal offense for a citizen of the United States or Chinese subjects to take Chinese subjects either to the United States or to any other foreign country, or for a Chinese subject or citizen of the United States to take citizens of the United States to China or to any other foreign country without their free and voluntary consent, respectively.

That is a very broad declaration. It is a broader one than we have with any other government in the world that I know anything about. It announces the right of expatriation, the right of adopting the citizens of other countries into the citizenship of this country and of China, and provides for a perfectly free migration and immigration from one country to the other of their citizens without any restriction whatsoever. On the contrary, that sort of interchange of population is encouraged very earnestly by that treaty.

Before that time we had passed laws, however, acting upon our inherent sovereign rights without respect to whether it suited China or not, to prohibit under heavy penalties the coolie trade. The coolie was sub modo a slave importation. It was the old slave trade somewhat modified by false pretenses; more than that, it was by actual fact, for the coolies were actually bought up by merchants in Hongkong and in that vicinity from the very lowest class of Chinese population, and were put on board ships under pretended contracts for limited terms of service, when the truth was that they were imported simply as the slaves of the men who got them and sold them to the importers.

So we put laws upon our statute book to prohibit that. Then we followed it up with the treaty of 1868, where we provided for a voluntary migration and emigration of the citizens of the respective countries, but protested very earnestly against any citizen of the United States or any citizen of China exporting or deporting from either country to the other or to any foreign country, persons who had been engaged to come under what might be practically called an involuntary system.

We tried that for eleven years, and we found that the effect of it was to bring a vast number of Chinese here for the purpose of being engaged in opening up the Pacific Slope, in railway works, in the vineyards and orchards of that country, in the wheat fields, in fact in all the menial lines of service. The Chinese who were brought here were taken up as very convenient servants; and we found that it was introducing into the American country a second form of slavery, one where the caste was just as distinctive as it was between the slave and his owner, and where the opportunity of the Chinese to intermingle with our communities was prohibited by public instinct and public conscience as firmly as it was between the negroes and the white people, or even more so. It was attended with every feature of slavery and servitude of a menial sort, except that having here the writ of habeas corpus we did not have the right to imprison the man's body and hold him under restraint and carry him where we pleased. That was about the only difference.

Now, when the American people struck down African slavery they struck down slavery for good and all in the United States. They never had any trouble about Indian slavery, for there never yet was a full-blooded Indian who was made a slave. It is the only race of people in the world I have ever heard of among whom slavery never existed in any form at all according to their own tribal organic laws, and it is the only race of people upon whom slavery has never yet been imposed. We had no trouble with the Indian race to get them out of the reach of the menial attitude of slaves in our country.

The Chinese and the negroes, however, we could handle in that respect, and we always handled them in such way as to put them beneath our feet, to make servitors of them at our will and pleasure, except in the case of the Chinaman when we give him an opportunity to trade. He could outwit us in traffic frequently, and as a matter of economy, of mere personal expense, he could always live cheaper than our American people could; so he became in this country a slave and a nuisance. We speak of him now in the literal sense that he occupied here. He was a slave, and he was a nuisance.

Thereupon the Californians and other people on the Pacific slope and in the vicinity of that part of the United States became very much excited upon the subject of the prohibition of the immigration of Chinese into this country. Then we modified our treaty of 1868 by a treaty that we made with China in 1880, by the free consent of that Government introducing into the treaty of 1880 a new principle, which revoked the former principle that was incorporated in the treaty of 1868.

What was that new principle? It took the distinction between the right of immigration and migration to the respective countries and the right of hospitality, a broad distinction very clearly defined in the treaty of 1880. China was consenting to it because she saw, as she confessed then and more distinctly confessed in later diplomatic intercourse, that her people were entirely unacceptable in this country, and that they could not rise to any social level, even the lowest in the United States, with the white people, and that they could not even become the recognized equals of our former slaves. They are a race that to-day in public estimation, in the gradations of public opinion, form a substratum beneath that of those people who were once held in slavery here and were imported into this country from Africa.

China, then, was perfectly content to carry out what was her true and has been her long-established policy of holding her people within her own domain. China struggled for many years to hold her commerce within the walls of exclusion, and she succeeded for a long time. Finally we broke those walls down partially. They never have been entirely broken down. There are only a few ports in China now to which you can export goods from the United States. The same sentiment caused the Chinese Government also to wish to include her citizenship within similar walls and to prohibit immigration.

That was the settled policy of the Chinese Government. It perfectly accorded with Chinese tastes and wishes and purposes, for there are no people in this world who are better contented with the form of government that has been over them for many centuries than the Chinese. I do not suppose that a Chinaman can now be quoted as having ever expressed or entertained a hope or a desire to have the institutions of China liberalized in the direction of the rights of self-government amongst the people. They are content with monarchy, it makes no difference how severe it may be; they are proud of it; they adhere to it. They have a national pride which amounts in every instance, I think, to a personal pride on the part of the Chinese that their Government represents the highest possible ideas of civilization. They believe it, and they are very happy in that belief. So they do not want to emigrate for the purpose of establishing permanent residences in any other country in the world that I know anything about.

I have never yet heard of a colony of Chinese voluntarily assembled with a view of becoming a part of a foreign government, and there building up social or political institutions. I never have heard of one expressing any dissent in respect of his monarchical government under which he lives. So they are a very contented people, and the policy of the Chinese Government accords entirely with the sentiments of the whole body of the population of that great Empire, containing, I suppose, between four and five hundred million souls, in respect of their exclusiveness in regard to commerce, heretofore scarcely broken down or impaired at all, and their exclusiveness in respect of migration and emigration to and from their country.

In 1880, for the purpose of extending Chinese trade, for the purpose of giving to their wealthier and their more educated classes the opportunity of visiting freely all the different parts of the earth—which in themselves were very good purposes—they consented to change the characteristics of the treaty of 1868, which provided for free migration and emigration and for the adoption of a new citizenship, to the mere rights of hospitality between the two countries of the citizens of each country in the other. That is the treaty of 1880.

Therefore we confined the right of Chinamen to come to this country to classes that stood above what they call and we call the laboring classes. The distinction was taken between those men who might come here and make a permanent settlement possibly, or a settlement for a number of years in this country, and those who were mere visitors, and who while here would enjoy the rights of hospitality.

When after 1880 we found it necessary to go still further with our legislation and to put very strong restrictions upon the importation of Chinese laborers, that class of people who might be disposed to remain here where they could get good wages, China made no objection of any serious character, because it did not infringe upon the true intent and purpose of the treaty of 1880, which was a treaty of hospitality.

The hospitality provided for in the treaty of 1880 was not infringed or restricted by our legislation. But our legislation was severe, and it began to make some impression upon the more enlightened classes of Chinese. Thereupon during the Administration of Mr. Cleveland, March 16, 1888, a treaty was negotiated for the purpose of smoothing out and having a more definite ascertainment of the real hospitality that the countries should exercise towards each other, which contained this very singular provision:

Whereas on the 17th day of November, A. D. 1880, a treaty was concluded between the United States and China for the purpose of regulating, limiting, or suspending the coming of Chinese laborers to, and their residence in, the United States; and

Whereas the Government of China, in view of the antagonism and much deprecated and serious disorders to which the presence of Chinese laborers has given rise in certain parts of the United States, desires to prohibit the emigration of such laborers from China to the United States; and

Whereas the Government of the United States and the Government of China desire to cooperate in prohibiting such emigration, and to strengthen in other ways the bonds of friendship between the two countries:

Now, therefore, the President of the United States, etc.—

Appointed Mr. Bayard and the Chinese Government appointed Mr. Chang Yen Hoon to negotiate that treaty of 1888, which was sent here for ratification.

I can speak freely about this because the injunction of secrecy has been removed from it.

Mr. GRAY. So, if the Senator will allow me, it appears by the attempted negotiation of that treaty or its actual negotiation—

Mr. MORGAN. Its actual negotiation.

Mr. GRAY. It appears by the actual negotiation of that treaty that we were about to accomplish with the friendly consent of China all that could be accomplished by the harsh exclusion laws passed since that date or before that date. Is not that true?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; that is true. The Chinese Government had quite as intelligent a view as we have had of this treaty. They understand the exact extent and the purpose also which operated in limiting or restricting the treaty of 1880, and in changing utterly and entirely the whole meaning and purport of the treaty of 1868.

The Chinese Government, through their minister here, signed the treaty of 1888, of course with perfect authority from that Government, for it must be remembered that if a Chinese minister makes a treaty with a foreign country and makes it obligatory in its terms and characteristics which he has not been authorized in advance to make, when he returns to China he simply receives the sharp edge of a sword on the back of his neck and his head falls into a basket, and that is the end of that minister. So they negotiate with their lives in their hands, and they do not put any expressions into treaties of a permanent and vital character, such as this was, without the prior consent of the emperor.

Mr. DAVIS. I wish the Senator would tell us why the Chinese Government did not ratify that treaty.

Mr. MORGAN. I am going to point that out now. When that treaty came into the Senate there were two provisions inserted here by way of amendment. In article 1 this provision was put in:

And this prohibition shall extend to the return of Chinese laborers who are not now in the United States, whether holding return certificates under existing laws or not.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL. Does the Senator from Alabama think that that provision changes at all the legal effect or fair construction of the provisions of the treaty as it had been sent to the Senate?

Mr. MORGAN. I thought it did at the time, and I voted against that amendment in consequence of that belief.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Secretary of State, in his communication to the President, made the statement distinctly that it covers that ground.

Mr. MORGAN. There is no doubt that the Chinese Government understood that it was a total abandonment of the former treaties, and that it was a breach of faith on the part of the United States, and was wicked. That is the way they looked at it. I was asked the reason why the Chinese Government did not consent to this treaty, and I am pointing it out. That is one reason.

Mr. GRAY. Because that amendment was placed on it?

Mr. MORGAN. Of course. Then there was another amendment to Article II:

And no such Chinese laborer shall be permitted to enter the United States by land or sea without producing to the proper officer of the customs the return certificate herein required.

That meant the original certificate, and if it had been lost no copy of it could be proved; it could not be established in any way except that the Chinaman to whom the certificate had been issued should actually produce it before he could come back. That related to the evidence upon which his right of reaccess to this country was predicated.

There are the two reasons why the Chinese Government rejected that treaty after having authorized their plenipotentiary here to sign it. Those provisions, in my opinion, produced this effect upon the treaty of 1888. They gave a coloring to it, put a gloss upon it which offended the Chinese people, while it might not have actually disturbed the legal, technical construction of the text of the treaty itself. But that is the fact. Thereupon and before that treaty could be ratified there came over from the other House the Scott bill, as it was called, which in a flurry of political excitement which was very much like some we are likely to get into now, the Senate took up and passed.

Mr. DAVIS. I should like to ask the Senator if, when the so-called Scott bill was passed, when it came over here the Chinese Government was not deliberating upon this treaty and the amendments to it, and had declined to ratify them?

Mr. MORGAN. The fact is this: The treaty had gone to China by cable, and they were deliberating upon the treaty as it had been signed and the amendments. They were of course satisfied with the treaty, as they had authorized it to be signed, but they objected to the amendments. However, before we knew what their decision was we passed the Scott law. What they might have done if we had not passed the Scott law I am unable to say. The Scott law differed a little in its stringency from the provisions by way of amendment of the treaty; it was a little more stringent, but not much. Perhaps the difference is hardly worthy of consideration. At the same time, it was a provoking cause to China, doubtless; I know it was, for withholding any consideration, I will not say consent to, but any consideration of these amendments; and so that treaty went by the board and the Scott law came in.

Since the Scott law was enacted and that treaty was rejected by China our relations with China have been practically as good as those with any other of the great civilized powers of the world. Very recently some missionaries from all of the great civilized powers have suffered in China, but the Government of China has also suffered, and suffered very fearfully, from an invasion that came down upon Peking from the northern provinces of China. In that country there are two or three secret societies of the most desperate and determined character, all of which are political and all of which are at war with the Empire. It is a quarrel that has lasted through many centuries, and is represented on the part of the assailants and the people by secret societies.

The Chinese Government have always to be on the lookout for outbreaks from these secret associations, and foreign people are frequently involved against the wish, or consent, or approbation of the Chinese Government, because these people, in order to foster their own secret organizations, to keep up the esprit de corps amongst themselves of murder and abominable outrage upon everybody that they choose to attack, keep up the ancient war upon foreigners which has existed in China, in Korea, in Japan, and in India, among all of those races, really of one family, along the coast of the Pacific Ocean.

Counting out these things which are to be credited entirely, I think, not to the hostility of the Chinese Government to the United States, or indifference on the part of that Government towards our relations with her, but are to be accredited to the personal hostility of certain classes of Chinese against all foreigners—counting that out, we have had no cause of a quarrel with China since the passage of the Scott act. On the contrary, our commerce has been going along there freely and with profit to both sides; and we to-day find ourselves confronted with this situation: Notwithstanding the utter change in our relations with her in respect of the right of emigration and migration of people to and from each country, and notwithstanding we have entirely abrogated the idea of permanent emigration from one country to the other, China has still proceeded in her even, smooth way; has kept her diplomatic representatives here; and there has been really no disturbance between the Chinese and the people of the United States resulting from the Scott act, nor is there any threat or apprehension of a disturbance.

Now, then, the question arises, is it proper, is it necessary, is it wise, that we should start on a new scheme of legislation which destroys the right of hospitality that is provided for in the treaty of 1880, and limit that down in such a way as that no man could come from China here except a foreign minister with his servants or a consul with his servants? That is about the limit now of the measure that is presented to us by the House of Representatives, as I understand it. Having abandoned the treaty of general free intercourse between our citizenship and their citizenship as secured in the Burlingame treaty, modified in the treaty of 1880, can we now deny to China by an act of Congress properly the rights of hospitality that were secured in the treaty of 1880, and is it wise to do it?

I can see no reason for giving offense to China by the further legislative modification of the rights of hospitality which were secured by the treaty with that country of 1880, when our experience has been that there has not arrived a large accession, to say the least of it, of Chinese people on the Pacific Slope or in other parts of the United States.

It is costing us some money to keep them out, but that is only a part of the police expenditure of the country which we have to sustain anyhow. A few of them get through Mexico and a few get through British Columbia, but the number that come here are scarcely to be called inconvenient. They do not come in such numbers as to present any real body of competitors in the great mass of work that is to be done in this country, and when they come here they distribute themselves among the railroads, where labor is pretty hard to secure anyway, and in the laundries, and in the kitchens, and in the gardens, and in the vineyards and other places where careful, patient, and painstaking hand service, menial service, is required.

So far as my observation has extended they have not seemed to be an inconvenience on the Pacific coast. I have had the honor or pleasure of visiting that coast on three occasions in the last few years and being a good deal associated with the people there, and it seemed to me that the Chinese service that was rendered in a domestic way upon that coast was of very great value and a great comfort to many people, inasmuch that I have always doubted to some extent the sincerity on the part of a great many persons in that part of the country to keep them out. But when I see their representatives here very earnestly advocating the most extreme measures for the purpose of their exclusion, I must give up the idea that they want to shut them out entirely.

But they distribute themselves over the country. I suppose there are probably 300 or 500 Chinamen in Washington City to-day, yet we are scarcely conscious of their presence. They are not a disturbing element in society or government here. The police have very little to do except once in awhile to raid them when they are unwilling to raid somebody else; they find a gambling shop and make a little out of it, sometimes reputation and sometimes profit. That is about all the public laws here have to do with China. You scarcely ever hear of their committing outrageous offenses of any kind at all. They do not concern themselves about politics, and in that particular they must be a very happy race of people.

The exigency is not of sufficient importance to demand this harsh legislation, which is in direct violation of the treaty of 1880, for we have guaranteed in that treaty that their merchants, traders, scholars, visitors of different kinds, shall have access to this country, and shall have free and honorable access to it. By the way, we are apt to learn a good deal from them as well as they are from us in their visits to this section of the world. I think that the exigency has not presented itself to demand of the Congress of the United States the exercise of that harsh power of repealing treaties, if indeed we have got the power in Congress, in that which is now presented for the consideration of the Senate. I suppose we might say that we have the power in a broad sense, but there are a great many powers we have that we should exercise very carefully.

We have the physical power, as the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] suggests, and we could put it in the form of a statute here; we can execute it; but we must recollect that is a boom-erang, for we have a very enterprising race of men in the United States who are beginning now to take lessons from their British ancestry and who are searching out the remote parts of the world for the purpose of carrying our commerce to it. We have a recent adoption by the Republican party of a great Democratic doctrine of reciprocity, which I am delighted that they have fallen into so gracefully, notwithstanding that they are always disposed to capture and appropriate to themselves everything that they can lay their hands on and claim it by the first original title. We have that reciprocity doctrine now abroad in the land.

We received from that country free of duty $14,577,887 worth of merchandise during the year ending the 30th of June, 1891. Besides that we have $4,743,963 of dutiable goods coming in, making a total commerce of importations of $19,321,850 during the last year. Then our exports for the same period of time have amounted to $8,700,318. That is no inconsiderable commerce, and it seems not to have been affected by the Scott law, for China after all understands that the Scott law was not a restriction upon the treaty of 1880. It operated upon laborers and not upon the exempted classes, but the act that we are proposing now abandons that idea and includes laborers and all of the classes exempted under the treaty of 1880 in a common refusal to admit them to any access to our shores.

There is prosperity in the commerce between China and the United States. It is just the dawn of prosperity between the two countries. It has not been more than thirty-five years since we gained our first commercial rights in China, and in that time, amidst great embarrassments, during part of which we were conducting amongst ourselves a terrible civil war, our commerce has run up continually, imports and exports have continually run up, fluctuating a little. At the same time it has got to be a very important commerce.

The Canadians and the British understand the value of that commerce, it seems, a good deal better than we do, for they admit Chinamen to come into Vancouver and spread themselves over the Canadian territory, and they make cheap rates of freight to China. They make contracts with the transpacific lines of steamers so as to bring Chinese commerce freely into Canada and across Canada to Great Britain. They encourage trade with China. They are after the trade of China in every possible form. It has been but a few years since, having large crops of opium raised in India, a country that is favorable for the production of that narcotic, they went to war with China and captured Hongkong, and established themselves right on the coast of China, so as to be able in that way, through force of arms and territorial acquisition, and through fortifications, to protect them hereafter, and through great navies that they send there to protect them still further. They have set themselves to work to reap a harvest out of China the richness of which the British people understand.

With the assistance of the Canadian railroad across the continent they are outstripping us in building up commerce with China. Instead now of our throwing away that rich field of commerce, we ought to cultivate it, and if we can cultivate it, and do it successfully, and increase it, as we can increase it by friendly, hospitable relations between our country and China, why should we not do it?

Is the influx of the Chinese into this country under existing laws inflicting upon us a damage greater than would be inflicted upon us by the loss of $22,000,000 or $24,000,000 of trade annually between the two countries? We can not possibly conceive that that is true, and if it is not true it is a very unwise step to put China into an attitude where she would break up her commercial relations with us.

China the moment we pass this law has a perfect right to say to us, "Every treaty relation between the United States and China is abrogated. You have broken the treaty by your legislation; you have repealed it; you have passed a law upon the asserted basis of your right to repeal a treaty; you admit the conflict between the law and the treaty, and you assert the right to repeal it, and when you pass the law of course you repeal it, and when you have done that we are exonerated, we are excused from any further compliance with it; so the treaty is abrogated." They have nothing to do but to withdraw their representation from here, and they are on just as safe ground as they were ever; we can not harm them and they can not harm us; but the misery of the situation is that we can not do them any good and they can not do us any good. Now, shall we put ourselves in that category?

If the commerce of China, as my friend from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] suggests, is in competition with our commerce in any respect this measure is an admirable system of protection; we ought to pass this bill for the sake of protecting our commerce against Chinese competition, for we are certain to lose every silver of it.

Mr. FRYE. If they should go into manufacturing cotton cloth they have good territory.

Mr. MORGAN. The Chinamen can not manufacture cotton cloth to compete with our friends in the North or in the South in the United States, because they have not the skill, they have not the chemical knowledge, they have not the power of inventing machinery and putting it in operation. For many years to come, perhaps for hundreds of years to come, China will be as dependent upon us or almost any civilized country, as France or England, for cotton-spinning machinery as she is to-day for the finer cotton fabrics that we send there.

But, Mr. President, I look to the opening up of a trade with China on a very immense scale as being something that we are about to arrive at, and we shall find, as I think, that that is one of the most compensatory lines of commerce that we can possibly engage in. The Chinese are learning already, as the Hindoos have been taught, to use wheat flour in place of rice flour, or in addition to rice flour, for the sustentation of human life. They have heretofore not enjoyed that great blessing of mankind because they have not known how to make it productive, how to make it useful and palatable, but now they are engaged in the production of wheat more than they have been in the past, and India has got a very large wheat-exporting country.

The English people, among other blessings that they have conferred upon India under their rule there, have taught them to grow wheat. China is to become a very great market for the wheat produced on the Pacific coast, and the Pacific coast needs that market. It really has no competitor for the Chinese and Japanese and Korean trade in wheat, except in India, and Great Britain wants every bushel of wheat that she can get from India. So the Pacific coast, if we will cultivate proper relations and put ourselves to work to accomplish the result, will find herself possessed of a market there for her wheat far exceeding in value anything that can be found in London or Liverpool.

Then the market for cotton is growing, and I am very much concerned about that, because we are continually accused here of flying in the face of Providence and producing too much of the good things that He has enabled us to produce upon our soil and with our climate.

Mr. FRYE. I should like to put a little bit of a speech right into the Senator's here.

Mr. MORGAN. I know it will be a good one, and better than mine, and I shall be very glad to hear it.

Mr. FRYE. The Committee on Commerce has been considering appropriations for rivers and harbors, and the Senators from the Pacific coast have been as usual very careful of the interests of their people and have been soliciting very large appropriations. The main ground for those appropriations has been that the Pacific commerce was to be really the commerce of the United States of America, that Puget Sound, for instance, was to be the scene of an enormous oriental commerce. Now, if the people of the Pacific coast build a Chinese wall by insulting the people of China or the Government of China, so that they will not send any of their commerce here, or permit us to send any of ours there, what becomes of the necessity of any further improvements of rivers and harbors on the Pacific coast?

Mr. MORGAN. Now, Mr. President—

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator from Alabama allow me to ask a question in reply?

Mr. FRYE. I interrupted the Senator from Alabama, and if he yields I will hear the Senator from Oregon with great pleasure.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Maine, in view of the fact that we have paid in gold and silver to China over $200,000,000 in the last twenty years to pay our balances, whether he thinks under that state of circumstances they are going to break off trade with us if we pass an exclusion bill?

Mr. FRYE. I have no doubt of it at all.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have.

Mr. FRYE. I have not the slightest doubt of it under the sun. If this bill should pass Congress, if the Emperor of China in less than sixty days did not declare his ports closed to the commerce of the United States and withdraw diplomatic relations, I am entirely mistaken in the Emperor of China and the minister from China here in this country now. I beg pardon of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. MORGAN. I knew when the Senator from Maine took the floor he would say something that I should be very happy to have inserted in the body of my speech. Inasmuch as he is a gold man and I am a bimetallic man, a silver man, as I am called, I will call his speech "apples of gold set in pictures of silver," when we come to serve out the tea of China upon this beautiful tray that has been presented here by the remarks of the Senator from Maine. The American people are going to have that tea, ladies particularly, and if China concludes to send her tea to London instead of sending it to New York, we will buy the tea, but we will buy it secondhand. That will be the difficulty. We will give up our direct intercourse with China for the sake of keeping out a few travelers here, and the balance of trade will be just the same, except that Great Britain will enjoy the first pull at it.

That will be the whole result. But we shall have the tea. The President might reimpose, since he thinks he has the power to do it, the highest tax upon tea, yet he would scarcely perceptibly reduce the consumption of that favorite beverage of our breakfast tables and tea tables in this country; it would come here just the same. The question is simply presented whether the United States in this case, as in a great many other cases that might be cited, will conduct its own business upon its own principles with foreign countries, without the intervention of a go-between.

I am tired of Great Britain as a go-between for all the commerce of this country imported and exported; and I am particularly tired of having Great Britain fix for us a single gold standard to which we have got to bring down the cost and price of every commodity imported and every commodity produced in this country, she furnishing the yardstick and lengthening it or shortening it at her pleasure to command our commerce, and she and Germany having control of bonds enough of the United States to harvest every dollar that our laboring people can make in the next fifty years in paying the principal and interest of these bonds if all their surplus profit should be devoted to the matter.

I was diverted from the point when I had an opportunity to say one word in favor of my unfortunate friend, the silver question, and my unfortunate friends, the silver people; but still it was apposite, and I thought I would say a word on that subject. Inasmuch as the Senator from Ohio and myself are now in harmony upon this treaty, I would assign our coin relations with China as being one of the principal reasons why we ought not to enact this bill, the prospect of our having in China a market, if you please, for a part at least of that enormous surplus of silver bullion which the Senator from Ohio is heaping up in the Treasury of the United States, and after awhile we shall either have to coin it or bring it under the hammer and sell it, unless the Secretary of the Treasury under some law which I believe we have enacted, or which he pretends we have enacted, shall go out and borrow gold from the other parts of the world and redeem our coin certificates and leave the silver still hoarded up in the Treasury.

I did not intend, Mr. President, to be led off into this, but it is a legitimate part of this argument, as in fact it is a legitimate part of every argument that concerns any transaction between the United States and foreign countries relating to commerce. But I merely wish to reassert that we can not afford to give up Chinese commerce, either present or prospective, and especially can we not afford to release the little hold we have already gained upon the prospective commerce of China because there are there four hundred and odd million people, laborious, frugal, industrious, and economical, compelled to be economical by the narrowness of the country and the superabundance of their population, and they are people to whom we are obliged to send a large amount of supplies, and an increasing amount as their capacity for consumption increases.

So I think the relations between the United States and China upon the basis of the treaty of 1880 are just and proper and safe for both countries. We find that in the précis to the treaty of 1888 negotiated by Mr. Bayard and signed by the plenipotentiaries of both Governments, a declaration was made that the Governments are in perfect accord with each other as to the wisdom of the general public policy of both countries for the exclusion of Chinese laborers from this country. We are in harmony about that, and let us preserve the harmony. After having accomplished as much as we have, and gotten along as we have with China to this day, do not let us for the mere sake of gratifying the caprices of some or the apprehensions of others violate the whole spirit of our existing treaty with China, and deny hospitalities to her people absolutely under the treaty of 1880.

Mr. SANDERS. Mr. President, I desire to say a word upon this subject, and that, too, not alarmed at existing conditions either for our religion or our civilization. The American Christian does not surrender his faith in a spirit of petulance or because legislative action does not accord with his desire. I am not conscious that anywhere in the United States during the quarter of a century that this population has been somewhat numerous within our borders anybody has ever been challenged by a disciple of Confucius to compare the faith or philosophy of Confucius with the religion of Jesus Christ in an intellectual debate upon any forum. Religious convictions like philosophies maintain their ground or are abandoned from purely intellectual considerations, and never until it shall be capable of being maintained in debate and in public thought that the religion of the Chinese Empire is preferable to our own is there the remotest cause for apprehension that the religion which prevails in the United States is in danger therefrom.

What may be said of our faith, if such we have, may also be said of our civilization. Outside the confines of China and so much of the surrounding lands as were described as the "ancient East" no opinion prevails that the civilization of that land is superior to ours. Whoso should make such an assertion would be laughed off the forum of public discussion. It is idle to pretend that the trend of the centuries is in that direction.

Notwithstanding these things are so, there is in my view ample reason why legislation like unto that which is proposed should be passed by the Congress of the United States, and when passed should be enforced. I am very mindful of the hesitation with which the people of the United States arrived at the conclusion that there was need of such legislation as this. My own intellectual experience accorded with theirs. The example of George Washington and the fathers of the Republic, the pride which they had in the land which they founded, their hope, often expressed, that it should ever remain a refuge for the oppressed of every kindred and tongue from all the lands under the sun, was very alluring, and none of us willingly abandoned the idea that the flag of our country was broad enough and strong enough to cover all classes and peoples that should flock to our shores, and that the social forces that operated here would assimilate them all into the civilization which here prevails.

These things being so, it was only under the pressure of an urgent necessity that we consented to enter upon an inquiry whether it was wise or prudent or proper—whether, indeed, it was in fulfillment of the expectation of the founders of the Republic—that this vast population coming from that country should be permitted to come here in such numbers as were threatened, for it had occurred that during the century since this Government was founded we had annihilated the distances that separated those lands from ours, and we became, as it were, next-door neighbors to all the peoples who live in that effete and ancient civilization and are wedded to it, and are petrified immovably and unchangeably in it.

We found another fact to be true, that the cupidity of men had succeeded in organizing processes by which something more than a normal influx of these people was obtained. Companies finding in the business of transporting them a great profit had sent out their emissaries into all that land and by artificial and abnormal processes had stirred within them a desire to come to the new Republic of America. As a result there was and has been a continually increasing influx of those peoples to these shores of ours.

The conditions therefore were changed, and we were brought face to face with a problem that our fathers never faced and that in their wisdom they never apprehended. We started to curtail Chinese immigration. Challenged as this legislation was, it was examined with great care and it was formulated in a law which I undertake to say, while it was not entirely satisfactory to the people more immediately interested, was a law with which they would have been reasonably content provided it had been enforced. But I undertake to affirm in this presence that that law is excellent as a story in the books but is not a fact in our social or commercial history. It is and it has been trodden under foot. It is and it has been disregarded. We who were more immediately interested in this matter consoled ourselves by saying if those people who are now here shall be the limit of that class of population the natural desire of individual members of it to return to their native land will certainly diminish somewhat the number, and from time to time, in a few years we can confidently rely upon the diminution, and by their death within a short period the extinction, of this class of people here.

It is some time since this legislation was upon your statute books, but, as a matter of fact, by the concurrent opinion of all men, I think I may say we have not diminished the number of the Chinese within the limits of the United States at all, and, on the contrary, I believe it to be true that their number has increased since the law was passed.

Two years ago we raised a joint committee of the two Houses of Congress and sent them in quest of information upon that subject. They brought back a vast mass of opinion evidence from a great many people living as far east as Spokane Falls, in the State of Washington, and as far south as San Diego, in the State of California. They said, as the conclusion at which they had arrived, that if this legislation which we now have could be enforced—I read from their report—

We are of the opinion that a reenactment of the present law, making the exclusion of coolies permanent, and a vigorous enforcement of that law and the proper facilities given the officials to bring about such enforcement, is all that is necessary in the premises.

That leads me to say that the existing legislation upon this subject does not proceed upon the hypothesis that it is essential to either our religion or our civilization. It is a law for the protection of American industry, and as such, if any law can be defended upon grounds economic in their character like that, is amply justified by the conditions and circumstances that existed when it was passed and the peril that was threatened and imminent at that time.

I know there is a theory extant that no nation has a right to use its frontier as an element of protection, and it stands upon a high moral and poetic basis of the universal brotherhood of the human race. It can be defended poetically, philosophically, and theoretically, but in the hard experience of human life, in the varied interests that various nations take upon themselves to forward and strengthen, I think the practical sense of mankind justifies the use of a national frontier to protect itself from such competitions as will impair the rewards which it offers to labor, and upon the ground of protection to American industry, to American workmen, to American toilers, the legislation that we have passed needs no further argument for support.

Now, it becomes us to inquire, as we are to determine for probably ten or fifteen years the conditions which shall exist, what we can do to allow certainly a normal diminution of this class of undesirable people so that ultimately they may be withdrawn from our presence. I undertake to say that if the twelve years that have passed is to be the measure of exclusion as to its effect upon these people, then we need some new legislation radically different from any we have had before. But as a matter of actual truth if we had enforced existing legislation with half the spirit that we enforced our other economic legislation we should not have had confronting us now the united conviction of the people where these Chinese are most numerous that the existing legislation is inadequate for the task that it has assumed. It is because we have not enforced this law that the opinion obtains there that new legislation is to be desired.

I do not find it necessary to say anything with reference to the quality of these people, desirable or undesirable. I agree entirely with the proposition that, in the first place, we must do that which the public faith and the public honor require, and that in any legislation which we shall enact here to-day we must have regard to those great principles of morality which underlie human action and forbid us to wrong any human being. We must have further regard to that no inconsiderable number of American citizens who within the Empire of China upon errands of beneficence or commerce, which is but another form of beneficence, are engaged in business there.

As to what has been pleased to be said about this legislation being in violation of a treaty there is inserted impliedly in every treaty the prerogatives which appertain to the high contracting powers and which, as they exist not by constitutional assumption, not by legislative creation, not by contract, but are inherent in governments and are a part and parcel of its prerogatives, stand as if they were inserted in every treaty under all circumstances, to be called into action and acted upon whenever in the judgment of the nation that entered into it, its supreme good requires that it shall be done. That authority and power is one that is incapable of suspension and incapable of annihilation. It can not be transferred; it exists in the order and nature of things.

Mr. President, let us see how this law has been enforced. We have five or six thousand miles of frontier. Of this about 4,000 miles is a frontier of land. On either side of us these Chinese can come with great ease. In fact, our Northern neighbors are making their influx into their communities a matter of speculation, and I know of no more happy financial situation than is occupied by the British Northwest provinces who are able, in the first place, out of the commerce of the importation of Chinese to make a reasonable profit to land them upon their shores, to collect the price of bringing them there, to collect $50 for their admission, and then to project them through the various canyons or over the prairies into the United States.

The legislation heretofore had upon this subject has proceeded upon the ground that its necessity was not required by any danger to our civilization or our religion, but as an economic defense of American labor. It sounds somewhat strange in a statute of the United States made in the name of a people who are laborers and who believe in the dignity of labor, and who in a career of two hundred and fifty years have done more than any other nation to dignify labor, to find put upon the statute books a law which discriminates against laborers, which proceeds upon the hypothesis that laborers are not as good as other people, which assumes as its essential postulate that only those who are demoralized and wicked and degraded labor, and a law which denies to the laborers of another country privileges which it accords to its teachers, its diplomats, its merchants. Not stopping to say anything as to that discrimination, and confessing indeed that a philosophical method of dividing these people was not convenient, I affirm that the word itself was selected because it was designed and desired to protect the laborer of the United States.

The misfortune of this matter has been that these people, adroit, shrewd, cunning, and in this respect not restrained by moral sensibilities or convictions, have been able to elude the discriminations sought to be introduced by the law. It is within the common observation of every gentleman who lives in that region that any Chinese person who, having been here one, five, or twenty-five years, desires to go back to China and return to the United States, no matter what avocation he has pursued, whether it be that of mining, whether it be that of farming, whether it be that of a household servant or a laundryman, finds no difficulty whatever in becoming a merchant and in satisfying the requirements of the law and obtaining a leave of absence practically from the United States as a merchant and immunity for his return. I do not believe that the law has operated to keep in the United States a solitary Chinese subject or person who has desired to go to his native land and then to return here.

Now, let us see some of the processes by which the law is evaded. Speaking for that region of country with which I am more immediately familiar, we have in the customs district of Montana and Idaho a frontier of 600 miles, of which not 20 miles is of such a character but that these people by night or by day may cross it when and where they please. The Congress of the United States two years ago, for the protection of at least 7,000 miles of frontier, of which 4,000 was like unto that which I have described, made an appropriation of $50,000, out of which sum, however, was to come such an amount of money as should be necessary to deport Chinese to their native land who had been found to be here in violation of the provisions of the law.

One year ago we raised that to $60,000, and I therefore congratulate myself that there is along this 600 miles of frontier and in its vicinity two persons known as Chinese inspectors, charged with the duty of seeing that by night or day unauthorized persons do not unlawfully cross the international boundary line, and that when, right along parallel with it and just behind it in Canada, there is a railroad that can leave these people at the various stations, every citizen of which is interested in having them leave Canada and come into the United States.

I say that this law is nearly useless as a matter of protection to the United States as to the persons who do actually desire to cross that line. These people are all the time studying how they can circumvent it. In fact the legislation itself presents some cases that I must say are somewhat pathetic. A denizen of the State which I have the honor in part to represent has a child in China, and it is not saying much for human affection to say that he desires to visit him or at least to have his child come and see his father, but there is no process by which that event can be accomplished that is consistent with honor, and inasmuch as this man is an honorable man he declines to enter into a process by which the law shall be circumvented.

But I only mention that instance to show that there are thousands of Chinese eager to circumvent this law and eager to come to the United States where the rewards of labor are so great.

The committee express an opinion as to the number who evade the law, with which I am certainly compelled to disagree. They say:

That some Chinese manage to surreptitiously come into the United States from British Columbia across the boundary seems to be established by the testimony, but this number does not exceed 300 annually.

British Columbia is that part of the British provinces to the north of us that lies to the west of the Rocky Mountains, although 400 miles of the frontier which I have described stretches from the Rocky Mountains to the east.

Another difficulty we have found in connection with the enforcement of the law as it stands is the action of the judicial tribunals in the various places, and notably in the State of California. I think perhaps this report describes that difficulty as well as I can do it, and I will therefore content myself with reading what they are pleased to say upon that subject. Premising that the officials at San Francisco, at which place nearly all the Chinese land, are exercising every precaution to keep out excluded classes with beneficial results, the report goes on to say:

The Chinaman is very shrewd and cunning and will resort to all practices in order to obtain admission to the country. The Chinese have employed counsel in San Francisco, whose duty it is to sue out writs of habeas corpus for all Chinese arriving in this country at that port who are denied a landing by the collector. The petitioners for the writ are allowed to give security for their appearance in court. They give their own countrymen as security, who willingly swear that they are worth double the amount of recognizance, although the officer taking the bail knows from past experience that such bail piece is utterly worthless, and that in these cases of habeas corpus large fees and costs accumulate, which have to be paid, and a very small percent age of Chinamen so landed are ever deported to China.

I stop, in reading that portion of the report, to make a single observation. It seems the Chinese civilization has got such a firm hold on the officials of San Francisco as that they think when an oath is formally made before them as to the solvency or possession of property of a surety upon a bail bond they are obliged to accept it, although they know that the story is false. That is Chinese civilization. Of course it was the first and supreme duty of the official to see that the object of requiring bonds was subverted, and whenever the matter ceased to be a tangible and palpable fact, and became purely and exclusively a matter of perjury and form, then to reject it, and to see that the security was good. Continuing, however, I read this:

It appears that the number of these cases amounted to 7,000 in the year 1888, and since then to 1,922.

I do not understand that, as this report is written with great ambiguity, with greater brevity, and in respect of the question that it discusses I am constrained to say that it is very unsatisfactory. I can not believe that to be true, for if there were 7,000 in 1888, why should the number diminish to nine hundred and some odd annually thereafter? It is fair to say, as is stated by the Senator from California [Mr. FELTON], it is probable they did not. I think this may be a typographical error, or it may have been a chirographic one; but I am not satisfied that it states the actual fact.

It is a fact that is patent to the dullest observation that officers of the judicial department of the Government deal with these cases in San Francisco by wholesale, and that the industry of taking care of them in the various aspects in which they present themselves before the United States commissioners there has become very large and well defined.

A very large number of the cases—

Continue the committee—

remain untitled on the court dockets. Of the cases disposed of above—

And this statement is remarkable—

67 per cent are ordered to be remanded and deported, and of this number so remanded less than 5 per cent are ever found and deported.

There you have a judicial tribunal with a defined duty; you have the officers of the law, and yet in this matter that is of supreme consequence to the people 95 per cent of the Chinese who were subject to it snap their fingers in your face and in the face of your courts and defy all that you have done or ordered to be done. If in any country under the sun the criminal laws passed for the regulation of the intercourse of man with man were thus defied we would denounce that condition of affairs as little less than barbaric. If 95 per cent of the persons convicted escaped we would say that the judicial tribunals had failed to fulfill their functions, and that it was time to call into exercise some other power and some other authority to the end that the august expression of a people found in their law might be enforced.

I say with reference to this matter, upon the suggestion of the honorable Senator from California [Mr. FELTON], that these are not State officers who are derelict in their duty:

Very few suits—

Continue the committee—

have been instituted upon the forfeited bail piece, as the United States district attorney informed the subcommittee that such suits would only result in further cost to the Government, as no property belonging to the bondsmen could ever be found to satisfy judgment. Another fact elicited is that the counsel generally employed in these cases are also attorneys of the Chinese consul and of the Six Companies. This has been a fruitful source of increasing the Chinese population—

The committee were not definite enough to inform us how—and your committee would suggest that in these cases no Chinaman be allowed to become security for the appearance of a petitioner unless he shall deposit, either in money or interest-bearing securities, in bank, to the credit of the case, the amount of such recognizance.

I take the liberty to ask the Senator from California if he has any information that will enlighten the Senate as to whether this slipshod method of conducting these judicial affairs still continues?

Mr. FELTON. I will state in answer to the Senator that on a decision made by the Supreme Court some two or three weeks since four hundred merchants were let loose.

Mr. SANDERS. Notwithstanding this suggestion of our committee appointed under a concurrent resolution of the two Houses of Congress, and that at a great expense traveled across this continent and up and down its Pacific coast, we hear nothing whatever of legislation whereby we shall stop the condition of affairs that exists in San Francisco and elsewhere touching the exclusion of the Chinese.

I think that such a condition as that continuing will demoralize any judicial tribunal; it will demoralize any people where a judicial tribunal of that kind sits; and while I do not agree with the committee that further legislation is required to bring that "most lame and impotent conclusion" to an end, I think, nevertheless, unless some other remedy can be applied, we might well pass some law upon that subject.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. SANDERS. With pleasure.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Washington [Mr. SQUIRE] is in the Chamber, who was the chairman of the subcommittee which went to the Pacific coast.

Although no report was made in the Senate a report was made by Mr. Lehlbach in the other House from which the Senator has been reading. In justice to the officials of the court I desire to say that Mr. James S. Manley, the deputy clerk, and Mr. John P. Cary, the district attorney, in the testimony explain at considerable length the reasons why it had been impossible effectually to execute the laws of the United States in reference to these recognizances and forfeited bail bonds. The sum and substance of it is that as long as Chinamen are allowed to become sureties for each other, the Chinaman outwits the American and it will require very stringent laws to prevent it.

The House bill has provisions which are intended to effect such stringency. The report of this committee was made on the 2d of March, 1891, just at the close of the last session of Congress. It was not really printed until since the present session commenced. I do not think that the United States officials in California are particularly to be blamed. They are overwhelmed by the evil. They lack money with which to prosecute and enforce the law the same as the inspectors along the British Columbia border lack money to enforce the laws, and they are therefore unable to enforce it, as the Senator from Montana has shown. The subject is a live one, I know, in the minds of the Committee on Immigration, and I do not think the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations will object to suitable provisions for making the law more stringent in the respects the Senator from Montana is criticising.

Mr. SANDERS. I do not know whether the report of the committee does any injustice to the officials in San Francisco or not. It is a report made for our information and I accept it as true. I do not understand the honorable Senator from New Hampshire to deny that the result of the judicial inquiries in San Francisco is as has been stated.

Now, the Senator is pleased to say that Mr. Manley, who is a clerk, or was a clerk, and some other gentleman, who I presume was identified with the enforcement of the law, explained that they were outwitted by the Chinese. Outwitted is not an appropriate word to describe it. Outwitted is a condition resulting from a contention between two wits. If what this committee say is true and continued for any considerable length of time, the Indian who stands in front of a cigar shop is just as good to enforce this law as the gentlemen who had the enforcement of it in the city of San Francisco. They did not manifest any wit at all.

The idea that day in and day out to the number of seven thousand cases they should accept pro forma a mechanical assent to an affidavit with the consciousness every day that they were being circumvented, and did not have sagacity enough to report the fact or to say that "this pretended and assumed oath is mouth service; I will not accept it; I have got to know where your property is; I have got to have some authoritative statement that it is yours, and it has got to be of such form that you can not in the twinkling of an eye separate yourself from it," is idle.

For that is one of the frequent traits of these men. They are incapable of identification almost. I have seen myself a debtor who had money enough to pay his debts walk into a crowd of one hundred Chinamen and his creditor could not pick him out. We might just as well undertake to select a particular bean from out of a half bushel. So that really this is a confession of incapacity; I will not say of pusillanimity.

I hope, and I will say furthermore I believe, that the condition of things is not so bad now. It would be strange if, in a city where public sentiment is as strong as it is in San Francisco, where it transcends somewhat sober conviction and is heated in its expression, a condition of that kind could exist for a very long period; and it does not do for those gentlemen to say that it is the fault of the law, if it be true that they are being circumvented as easily as that. It is not possible to weave into the forms of a statute by any words we can get out of any dictionary a law that, in the hands of officers manifesting that spirit, would be of the remotest significance against any form of crime whatever.

Another thing which has resulted is this: Writs of habeas corpus are issued for five hundred Chinamen, we will say, on board ship, or whatever the number is, and they are permitted to give bail that they will be forthcoming to answer the determination as to whether their detention is lawful or otherwise, with similar results. I am satisfied that condition of affairs does not longer continue.

But so far as our frontier is concerned, this 7,000 miles of it, of which 4,000 is a land frontier, it is proposed in the first place to take out of the $50,000 enough money to ship back to China all of the Chinese that unlawfully attempt to land or did land and are there, and use the balance for our protection. That is perfectly and utterly idle. If that frontier concerned something along our eastern coast or to the north or the south of these Atlantic States, the frontier would bristle with men who were there watching to see that the laws were not thus circumvented.

So, Mr. President, the Senate and the country must expect that there is a well-defined dissatisfaction with the existing conditions. The statistics which are published here in this report show that the average length of time that a Chinese person resides in the United States is between three and five years, and this is based upon statistics which have been gathered and are of greater or lesser reliability, but if it was for five or ten years we should soon get rid of this horde of immigrants, provided this law was enforced.

Believing myself that this law is beneficent, believing that it is the entering wedge which is going to open our eyes, making us more careful to sift the populations that we admit to the great privileges of our industrial and political and social life, I insist that we shall have a different condition of affairs than that which has existed heretofore.

Confessing that the subject is one difficult to solve, I do not know whether the proposition suggested by the honorable Senator from California [Mr. FELTON] that we shall have a descriptive list of all Chinamen who come into the United States, or who are here, so precise and exact as that we can identify each one and see that some other person does not circumvent our laws, will be adequate to remedy this evil or not.

This very legislation of ours has built up a great industry in the Empire of China. There are commercial marts there where certificates of a right to return to the United States are for sale. Chinese persons coming over here get a certificate for leave to go back to China and return, and brokers there along their river front buy them out, advertise them, and boldly sell them to persons who to some extent resemble the persons therein described. It is a great and remunerative industry. They are sold for a very considerable price, $200 or $300 apiece, I am advised.

So you see we have been mocked, and that is why we are dissatisfied. We are asked when we want bread to content ourselves with a stone. We do not do it; our people do not do it. They are sober-minded on this subject; they do not partake of the clamor that is wild and wicked; they have no purpose of revenge; they believe that there never would have been a time when we would have welcomed into this country any population except upon the assumption that that population would ultimately assimilate to our people and with our civilization. In the faith that it would, they have cheerfully heretofore and they will cheerfully hereafter welcome without fine discriminations every class of people which will probably so assimilate. But here is a race that is petrified, as changeless as the stars in heaven, holding in utter contempt everything of ours except our gold. Our morality, our truthfulness, our generosity, our unselfishness—what care they for these? Every form of action to them is right which aids in the maintenance or the building up of that great Empire, and therefore they exist by themselves. Their civilization in their view is better than ours.

The report of this committee says—it is a somewhat severe and

I hope it is an untrue remark—that even the Chinese who adopt the Christian faith do it through a desire to acquire the English language and enable them thereby to work a little more effectively the cunning which they possess. However that may be, it is sufficient to say that, by a consensus of opinion which I do not understand the Senator from Massachusetts even to interrupt, it is not desirable that these people shall be multiplied in this country, but that they shall be diminished to extinction.

It is desirable by efficient law. It is desirable by such methods as are consistent with our integrity, as are consistent with all the interests of all the people of the world, that we shall separate ourselves from that civilization, from that religion, from that industry, from that method of life, from that social organization, and save this continent at least to those peoples who heretofore have made it a continent of homes who in noble aspiration have possessed it and have made its deserts to rejoice and blossom as the rose.

Mr. MITCHELL obtained the floor.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understand from the Senator from Oregon that he does not desire to address the Senate this evening, if it can be avoided. I, therefore, with his consent and the consent of other Senators with whom I have conversed, ask that unanimous consent of the Senate may be given that the general debate on this bill shall terminate on Monday at 4 o'clock, the bill then to be open to such amendments as may be offered under the five-minute rule. I ask that that may be ordered by unanimous consent of the Senate.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask the Senator from Ohio to couple with that request an agreement that we shall take up the bill at 1 o'clock.

Mr. PLATT. That we shall take it up whenever we get through with the routine morning business.

Mr. SHERMAN. As soon as the morning business is concluded on Monday I shall ask the Senate to take up the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DIXON in the Chair). The Senator from Ohio asks unanimous consent that, after the completion of the morning business on Monday, the pending bill shall be called up and that debate on the bill shall close at 4 o'clock.

Mr. MITCHELL. I suggest to the Senator from Ohio to say half past 4.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think we had better say 4 o'clock. That will give us three hours for debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is proposed that the general debate shall close at 4 o'clock, and after that it shall proceed, under the five-minute rule, on amendments to be offered. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

DISTRICT APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives nonconcurring in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6746) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893, and for other purposes, and asking a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

On motion of Mr. ALLISON, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist on its amendments to the said bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

By unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. ALLISON, Mr. DAWES, and Mr. COCKRELL.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SHERMAN. With the consent of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL], who has the floor, I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. SAWYER. I ask the Senator to withdraw that motion that I may move an executive session.

Mr. SHERMAN. I withdraw the motion for that purpose.

Mr. SAWYER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 3 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, April 25, 1892, at 12 o'clock m.

CONFIRMATIONS.

DESERTIONS FROM THE ARMY.

The SPEAKER. Upon this bill the Senate ask for a conference.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House non-concur in the amendments of the Senate and agree to a conference.

The motion was adopted.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a bill (H. R. 7818) to provide for certain of the most urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1892, and for other purposes, with amendments of the Senate thereto; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

W. H. HOWARD.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the House Calendar and consider at this time the bill which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5396) for the relief of William H. Howard.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Post-Office Department, in settling the accounts of W. H. Howard, postmaster at Cobb, in the State of Georgia, be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to credit said Howard with the sum of $75, that being the value of Government stamps, supplies, etc., destroyed by fire in said office without fault on the part of said Howard.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, I wish simply to say this: The amount in the bill as proposed to be amended is some $33. The Department would have allowed it if the claim had been received there within the period of three months, but, for lack of proper information, this claimant sent it to the wrong office, so that the Department could not pay it. So the committee say, and therefore this special bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

The Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads reported the following amendments; which were adopted:

In line 6 of the printed bill, before the word "dollars," strike out "seventy-five" and insert "thirty-three."

In lines 6 and 7, after "dollars," insert "and five cents."

The amendments were adopted.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BLOUNT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN NICKLES.

Mr. COBB of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 1415) for the relief of John Nickles.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $1,016 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, from the Treasury of the United States, to pay the claim of John Nickles for the purchase price paid by him to the United States for 400,000 feet of lumber, laths, and logs bought by him from the Government of the United States at Big Cottonwood Canyon, in the Territory of Utah, on the 28th day of September, 1876, the title to which has failed; and the further sum of $235.80 cents, being the amount paid out by said Nickles as costs of court in litigating the title of said property with the adverse holders thereof, making a total sum of $1,252.80, which is hereby appropriated as aforesaid.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. BUTLER. Reserving the right to object, I would like to hear something about the case.

Mr. COBB of Missouri. Mr. Nickles bought at a Government sale some lumber, paying $1,000 as earnest money. The Government could not give title to the property; and now he simply asks that it refund to him the money which he paid.

Mr. DOCKERY. That appears to be a very clear case.

Mr. DINGLEY. Is there a report?

Mr. COBB of Missouri. Yes, sir; it is unanimously reported. The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. COBB of Missouri, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

QUINCY McNEIL.

Mr. HENDERSON of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 6033) for the relief of Quincy McNeil, and that it be considered at this time.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to correct the record of the dismissal of Quincy McNeil, major of the Thirty-ninth Regiment of United States Colored Troops, and issue to him an honorable discharge from the Army, to date April 4, A. D. 1865.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. What was the cause of this man's dismissal from the Army?

Mr. HENDERSON of Illinois. I ask for the reading of the report.

The report [by Mr. NEWBERRY] was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom were referred the bill (H. R. 6033) for the relief of Quincy McNeil, submit the following report: Quincy McNeil entered the volunteer service in May, 1861; was mustered in as captain Thirtieth Illinois Infantry May 21, 1861; promoted to major Second Illinois Cavalry August 10, 1861; mustered August 13, 1861; resigned December 31, 1862. He was subsequently mustered into service as major Thirtieth United States Colored Troops March 10, 1864. He was tried by court-martial and cashiered as of date February 20, 1864.

Your committee have reviewed the charges, specifications, testimony, and finding of the court, and sum it up in brief: That while in transit by sea he became drunk and indulged in coarse and ungentlemanly language. From the fact that this conduct was not when before the enemy and was not habitual this committee think the finding unusually and unnecessarily severe. No other offenses are charged.

Your committee considered a letter of the colonel of his regiment, the adjutant, and twenty of the captains and lieutenants recommending and praying his honorable discharge.

The committee also considered petitions of many citizens and officials of his city, county, and State, without regard to political affiliation, all commending him as a brave, true man.

Your committee recommend that the bill do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. McMILLIN. This seems to be a rather weak case. The insubordination is not denied; the drunkenness is not denied. The only palliation offered is that the drunkenness was not "in the face of the enemy." It strikes me it would have been rather unfortunate for the man if he had been drunk "in the face of the enemy;" but I do not see how the circumstance suggested constitutes any palliation of the offense. I do not know that I shall press any objection to this proposition, but of all the weak cases of making heroes, this seems to be one of the weakest; and it is rather hard on the Government to make them by statute when we consider what consequences will probably flow from this action. Is the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENDERSON] willing to accept an amendment providing that this bill shall not operate in any way to entitle this man to pay, emolument, or pension?

Mr. HENDERSON of Illinois. If the gentleman had observed the reading of the report he would have found that the discharge in this case is to take effect from April 24, 1865; so that the bill is not intended to carry any pay or emoluments in any way.

Mr. McMILLIN. But as I understand, the very fact of the honorable discharge taking effect from that date is what might entitle this man to some pecuniary advantage.

Mr. HENDERSON of Illinois. There is nothing due him. While I have no objection to such an amendment as the gentleman suggests, I want to say this—

Mr. McMILLIN. If the gentleman will accept an amendment providing that this bill shall only operate to give the man an honorable discharge, and shall not entitle him to pay, emolument, or pension, I have no objection to its consideration.

Mr. HENDERSON of Illinois. The report on this case was made by Gen. NEWBERRY, a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, and it is, as I understand, the unanimous report of the committee. I have known this man personally for probably forty years. He was a brave soldier and performed his duty well. But while on board a vessel going with his command, as I believe, to North Carolina he got on a little "spree," and was guilty of using some vulgar language offensive to the commanding officer, in consequence of which this harsh and unjust verdict was rendered by a court-martial—a verdict which some members of the court themselves have said they never contemplated would be carried out to the extent it has been. This is the case of a brave man who imperiled his life on many fields of battle.

Mr. McMILLIN. It must have been a very strange court that did not have confidence enough in itself to suppose that its findings ought to be carried out.

Mr. HENDERSON of Illinois. I do not know why it was that this harsh verdict was allowed to stand.

Mr. McMILLIN. If the gentleman is willing (as I understand he is) to accept an amendment that this bill shall not entitle this man to any pension, I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BUTLER. Reserving the right to object, allow me to say a word as to the present phase of this matter. If this man ought to be placed upon the record as an honorably discharged soldier, then it would be absolutely wrong to attach to our action a condition that he shall never be entitled to a pension, even though he might show he deserved it on general principles.

Mr. HENDERSON of Illinois. I think so myself—

Mr. BUTLER. I do not believe in putting any such condition upon a bill of this kind.

Mr. HENDERSON of Illinois. I agree with the gentleman; but nevertheless—

Mr. McMILLIN. Does the gentleman from Iowa think this is a strong case?

Mr. BUTLER. I think it ought not to come in by unanimous consent.

Mr. McMILLIN. As the gentleman objects to my position in this matter, I shall not insist upon it, but will leave the House to take such course as it may think best.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. KILGORE. Was this bill before the House last night?

Mr. HENDERSON of Illinois. No, sir.

Mr. KILGORE. Well, I think I prefer to have the matter stand over until we can find out something more about it.

Mr. HENDERSON of Illinois. The report has been read.

Mr. KILGORE. I could not hear the reading of the report. Did the gentleman from Illinois accept the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. HENDERSON of Illinois. I understand that is not insisted upon.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered, ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HENDERSON of Illinois, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

DE LOSS CRAMER.

Mr. BENTLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 793) to amend the military record of De Loss Cramer, and put it upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc. That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to correct the military record of De Loss Cramer, late lieutenant of Company F, Fourteenth Regiment New York Volunteers, by expunging from said record the dishonorable discharge imposed by a court-martial.

Mr. BENTLEY. I ask that the report accompanying the bill be read.

The report (by Mr. ROCKWELL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 793) to amend the military record of De Loss Cramer, respectfully submit the following report:

De Loss Cramer enlisted May 17, 1861, as a private in Company F, Fourteenth New York Volunteers, to serve for the term of two years. He was a brave and faithful man and soldier; was early promoted to be first lieutenant, and so continued until within about two months of the end of the period of his enlistment, about which time some visitors from the Ninety-seventh New York Regiment, raised in the neighborhood of his home, visited the boys of the Fourteenth Regiment, and some of them becoming convivial and were making considerable noise when Lieut. Cramer joined them. The jollification attracted the attention of Col. Davis, passing by, who asked the boys to make less noise, when one John Manchester, one of the visiting boys of the Ninety-seventh Regiment, said: "Go to hell, you son of a gun."

Col. Davis charged the utterance of these words upon Lieut. Cramer, substituting for the word "gun" a more offensive word, and upon this charge Lieut. Cramer was court-martialed and convicted of being drunk and disorderly and of speaking the offensive words imputed to him. Cramer was a man so loyal to his friend that he would rather suffer wrong than betray him, and he therefore plead not guilty, but made no defense.

After the close of the war proofs were submitted to the War Department showing that Cramer was not the person who had used the words imputed to him, but the Department held that as Cramer was also convicted of being drunk and disorderly, the conviction would not be disturbed.

It is believed that sentence of dishonorable dismissal from the service would not have followed a conviction upon the sole charge of being drunk and disorderly, and as the proofs presented entirely exonerate Lieut. Cramer from the graver offense imputed to him, his record should be amended and an honorable discharge be granted him.

Your committee have reported an amendment to the bill proposed, by striking out all after the word "Volunteers," in line 6, and by adding at the end thereof the words, "and to issue to said Cramer an honorable discharge," and as so amended recommend that the bill do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Speaker, I think this is the same bill which was before the House last evening.

Mr. BENTLEY. It was.

Mr. KILGORE. And the report was not read in full. I understand that this is a case where this gentleman, together with several other comrades, were engaged in painting the town. [Laughter.]

A MEMBER. Mildly.

Mr. KILGORE. Well, a mild red perhaps; so the report says, and the superior officer coming along he or one of his comrades called him a "son of a gun," and this man struck out the word "gun" and inserted a more offensive epithet. He was subsequently court-martialed and dismissed from the service. Now the proposition is to put him back in the service, and on the same footing with officers who did their whole duty from the beginning to the end. He not only avoided the service, and the dangers incident thereto, from the time that he was dismissed, but he was offensive to his superior officer, and the case offers so clear and grave a breach of military discipline that it seems to me the House ought to be particularly careful in passing such measures.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KILGORE. Yes.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Is not the gentleman from Texas mistaken in saying that this man used a more opprobrious epithet—

Mr. KILGORE. More offensive, I said.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Does not the report set out this condition of facts: that this man did not hear the language used at all, but in the accusation made by the officer he was charged with having used this word. The fact is that it was another one of his comrades who use the language.

Mr. KILGORE. Was he not tried for having used the word?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. He was tried, and plead "not guilty" but offered no proof in his own defense. Subsequently proof was furnished to the War Department showing that he suffered this wrong rather than to disclose the name of the party who did use the language. He was not the guilty party at all.

Mr. DOCKERY. With that statement of facts the case seems to present unusual merit.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. That is the case exactly.

Mr. ROCKWELL. There is no question of that.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The amendment recommended by the committee was adopted, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BENTLEY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid upon the table.

D. P. ABBOTT ET AL.

Mr. WILSON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 4270) for the relief of D. P. Abbott, A. S. Keoves, and T. E. Smith.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to objection. The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to pay to D. P. Abbott, A. S. Keoves, and T. E. Smith the sum of $4,728.80, to reimburse them for the amount paid by them into the Treasury of the United States as the sureties of J. G. Walker, deputy collector of internal revenue for the sixth Missouri district under Charles E. Hasbrook, late collector of said district, being the face value of certain internal-revenue stamps in the possession and custody of said Walker as such deputy collector, which were on or about the 25th day of September, 1888, stolen from said Walker by burglarious entrance into his office, without any fault or neglect on his part.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. WILSON of Missouri, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

USE OF OFFICIAL ENVELOPES BY UNITED STATES COMMISSIONERS.

Mr. WAUGH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6490) to amend an act entitled "An act establishing post-roads, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1877.

Be it enacted, etc., That the right and privilege granted by said act, to which this is amendatory, to transmit through the mail free of postage any letters, packages, or other matters relating exclusively to the business of the Government of the United States be, and the same are hereby, extended to the commissioners of the district and circuit courts of the United States; and it shall be the duty of the Attorney-General of the United States to supply said commissioners the necessary envelopes provided by section 6 of said act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. DOCKERY. Reserving the right to object, I did not understand from the reading of the bill to whom this privilege was to be extended.

Mr. WAUGH. To commissioners of the circuit and district courts of the United States. Under the existing law the use of official envelopes is denied them.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. WAUGH, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

PUBLIC STREET, ABINGDON, VA.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 4620) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to consent to the use of a portion of the public grounds of the United States in the town of Abingdon, Va., for a public street.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to consent, if in his judgment it be proper, to the use of so much of the public grounds belonging to the United States in the town of Abingdon, not exceeding 30 feet in width, on the west side of said public grounds, for a public street in the said town, upon such terms and conditions as he may deem proper for the protection of the rights of the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BUCHANAN of Virginia, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

VACANCIES IN THE BOARD OF MANAGERS, NATIONAL SOLDIERS' HOME.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order. Mr. OUTHWAITE. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that for one moment, to allow me to present a resolution.

Mr. KILGORE. I will withdraw it for a moment.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I ask unanimous consent to consider a resolution to fill vacancies in the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers. The time expired yesterday. It will take only two or three minutes to consider the matter.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 97) to fill vacancies which will occur in the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers on April 21, 1892.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That Gen. William J. Sewell, Gen. Martin T. McMahon, Capt. John L. Mitchell, and Maj. George Bonebrake be, and are hereby, appointed managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers for the terms of office commencing on the 21st day of April, 1892, to fill vacancies which will occur by expiration of terms of office.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. DINGLEY. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio if this is unanimously reported from the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. As far as I know, it is a unanimous report of the committee.

Mr. BUSHNELL. I would like to ask whether that resolution has any application to the Soldiers' Home here in Washington?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. None whatever.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. There is an amendment, to omit the name of Maj. George Bonebrake, in line 4, and to insert instead thereof the name of A. W. Barrett, of Los Angeles, Cal. The law requires that one of the members of this board shall be appointed from the Pacific States. As I have not the full name of Mr. Barrett, but simply his initials, I deem it necessary, and the committee deem it necessary, to insert the words "A. W. Barrett, of Los Angeles, Cal."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 4, after the word "and," insert the name of "A. W. Barrett, of Los Angeles, Cal.," in place of "Maj. George Bonebrake."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, this resolution came before the House about a month ago, I think, and was withdrawn by the committee something like a week ago.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Two weeks ago.

Mr. LOUD. I find it is proposed by the committee to withdraw the name of the gentleman from California who was proposed in the first resolution. It would seem to me that if the House itself has no interest in this matter, at least there is a courtesy due the members from California. Three of them at least were unfortunate enough or fortunate enough to be soldiers during the war, and may at some time be members of that home. I say, sir, I think it is necessary that some statement or explanation should be made by the committee giving the reasons for this change.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Speaker, the resolution was withdrawn and submitted again to the committee, and Maj. Bonebrake, whose name is mentioned here, appeared before the committee and withdrew his name. At that time he submitted the names of two gentlemen from California, one of whom was Mr. A. W. Barrett. The other name I can not recall. Those two names were considered by the committee. A member from the State of California who is upon the committee made some objection at first, as I am informed, to the appointment of Mr. Barrett. I do not know that he urged the appointment of the other gentleman, but he preferred him, I think, to Mr. Barrett. After some discussion of the matter, as I am informed—I was not present at the meeting, and there are members of the committee here who were present who can correct me if I am misinformed—it was agreed, without any purpose of opposition upon the floor by any member of the committee, that the name of A. W. Barrett should be substituted. That is about all the explanation I can give. As to not consulting the delegation from California, I do not understand the law to require that the appointee shall be a resident of California.

Mr. LOUD. Certainly not.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. The law does require that the appointee shall be a resident of a State west of the Rocky Mountains.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Do I understand that they do not desire this appointment in California? If so, why not give it to the State of Washington, which is on the Pacific Slope; and I will name a man in two seconds who will be satisfactory to all parties.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I do not understand that you are stating exactly the position of the gentleman from California.

Mr. LOUD. I will state, Mr. Chairman, that it is evident the committee did not withdraw the report for the purpose of allowing Maj. Bonebrake to come before that committee and resign. I think I am substantially correct in that statement.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. You certainly are.

Mr. LOUD. If I state anything but the facts I hope I may be corrected. When the report was withdrawn, I saw several of the members of this House and of this committee, and we had some conversation relating to Maj. Bonebrake; and several members of the majority of the committee agreed that if the name of Maj. Bonebrake were withdrawn, his successor should be named by the gentleman from California [Mr. BOWERS]. Now, I should like to know if the gentleman from California [Mr. BOWERS] named Mr. Barrett, or not. Can the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE] inform me on that subject?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. As the records of the committee show, Mr. Barrett was named by Maj. Bonebrake. Maj. Bonebrake named Mr. Barrett and another gentleman. So far I can speak, and no further.

Mr. LOUD. I simply wanted to get at the facts before this House. If the committee desired to withdraw their report and substitute a Democrat in the place of a Republican I have not a word to say. They have the right and the power to do that, and if that was their object I want it stated on the floor of this House.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I can assure the gentleman that was not the purpose of the committee. I can further assure him that substantial reasons could be given to this House by matters of record why the committee would have made the change, in all probability, had not Mr. Bonebrake voluntarily withdrawn his name.

Mr. LOUD. I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio if he thinks it proper for the gentleman naming Mr. Barrett to have named him instead of permitting the delegation from California to do so?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I can not answer that.

Mr. LOUD. Does not the gentleman think when a person is put there from the State of California, that the State of California should have been allowed, out of courtesy, if not out of law, the privilege of indicating their preference?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. No; it has not been the custom of the committee to consult any delegation about who should be on the board or under the law.

Mr. LOUD. Does the committee think that they should appoint a gentleman because he is a Democrat when they have no evidence as to his standing?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. There were other recommendations as to this same gentleman, I am informed.

Mr. BARTINE. If the gentleman will permit me, I will state that I am personally acquainted with Capt. Barrett; and if he is a Democrat, he is one of the finest men in the world.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I did not know he was a captain; but I knew he was a Democrat. Now, Mr. Chairman, I think we have exhausted the debate upon this subject. I do not think the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] wishes to say anything further.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was adopted.

On motion of Mr. OUTHWAITE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. KILGORE. I demand the regular order.

DISTRICT APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations to report back to the House the bill (H. R. 6746) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments.

The title of the bill was read.

Mr. DOCKERY. Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire that the report be printed in the usual form, and inasmuch as it includes a hearing before the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations upon a matter of special interest, I ask unanimous consent that it also be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request that the report of the committee be printed in the RECORD? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the report will be printed in the RECORD, and also in the usual form.

Mr. DOCKERY. Now, Mr. Speaker, by the unanimous action of the Committee on Appropriations I am directed to ask that the House agree to Senate amendments 5, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 38, 39, 88, 89, 90, 119, 120, 121, 132, 141, and 147, named in the report. These amendments are essentially verbal and formal. I also ask that the House disagree to the remaining amendments of the Senate, and that a conference be asked.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to this request?

Mr. OATES. I understand the gentleman from Missouri to say that the amendments he desired the House to agree to are merely formal.

Mr. DOCKERY. They are merely formal, and the request does not relate to any provision of the bill carrying an appropriation.

Mr. OATES. And as to all the other points you ask nonconcurrency?

Mr. DOCKERY. I ask a disagreement as to the remaining Senate amendments. The committee is unanimous in submitting this request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri to nonconcur in the Senate amendments and ask for a conference? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The Chair will appoint as conferees the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY], the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COMPTON], and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON].

The report is as follows:

Mr. DOCKERY, from the Committee on Appropriations, submitted the following report (to accompany H. R. 6746):

The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6746) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893, and for other purposes, together with the amendments of the Senate thereto, having considered the same, beg leave to report as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the Senate amendment relating to this matter.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay for subsistence and quarters of such honorably discharged non-resident Union soldiers, sailors, and marines who served in the war of the rebellion as may attend, as delegates or otherwise, the twenty-sixth national encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic, in the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary. And the sum hereby appropriated shall be paid to and disbursed by the citizens' executive committee of Washington having in charge such reception and entertainment, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War."

The CHAIRMAN. Will you kindly state to the committee the terms of your invitation to the Grand Army of the Republic?

Mr. EDSON. The best way would be to read the invitation that was issued by the invitation committee.

Mr. Edson read the paper as follows:

National Encampment Grand Army of the Republic, Washington, D. C., 1892.

The citizens of Washington, the capital of the nation, extend to the Grand Army of the Republic a hearty invitation to hold its national encampment in 1892 in this city.

It is needless to speak of the welcome the veterans of the Union will receive when they come to Washington. There is no city in the world that would not be proud to receive them, and there is no city in the land which Washington would permit to outdo it in honoring and entertaining the Grand Army. The citizens of Washington were glad enough when the boys in blue came there in 1861. They will make them feel more than welcome if they will come again in 1892—come again and see a city that is four times as large as then and a thousand times as beautiful. As an earnest of their hospitable intentions, an ample guaranty fund has been subscribed to provide for appropriate entertainment of members of the encampment and for the usual expenses of such assemblages. This invitation is extended with a belief on the part of the citizens that, great as is their desire to welcome to their homes the men who fought for the Union, there are many thousands of veterans who have a desire equally as strong to visit Washington and the battlefields in this vicinity, ground consecrated by the valor of the soldiers of the Union.

Washington is the capital of the nation. It is the most beautiful city on the continent. It is stored with objects of patriotic interest, and while the attractions of its public buildings, its beautiful streets, its parks and monuments, its museums, and the presence of the Government appeal strongly to all classes, there are historic associations that put Washington far beyond comparison with other cities in the interest of the veteran of the war. On every hill around it are the footprints of the war. A few miles away is the field of Bull Run, where the soldiers of the Union got their first stern lesson in war.

It is but a pleasant day's excursion to the field of Antietam. It is a short and easy journey to the great battle ground of Gettysburg, where the tide of war was turned. Washington is at the center of an historic region, whose towns and streams bear names that call up vivid memories of battle. In this region, all within the radius of a day's journey, lie all the famous fields on which the army of the Potomac fought its great battles, from Bull Run to Appomattox. An inviting steamboat ride down the river and bay, pass many points of historic interest, including Mount Vernon and the tomb of Washington, brings one to Hampton Roads, where the Monitor and the Merrimack fought and naval warfare was revolutionized.

Then the ground of all of McClellan's operations against Richmond in 1862—Yorktown, Seven Pines, Fair Oaks, Gaines Mill, the seven days' battle, Savage Station, and Malvern Hill—can all be easily reached and traversed from Washington. Fredericksburg and Chancellorsville, of tragic memory, are close at hand. Then the men who were with Grant in 1864 and 1865! They can visit again the Wilderness, where such hot fighting was done—Spottsylvania Court-House, Cold Harbor, Five Forks, and all the fields where the great captain commanded, and Richmond, whose fall signaled the death of the Confederacy.

Near by is Harpers Ferry, teeming with its war associations, and the Shenandoah Valley, quite as famous for its memories of Sheridan and his men as for its beauty, lies within the limits of a day's excursion.

The city itself, with Arlington and other great national cemeteries, with its monuments to great commanders, whose names are held in loving memory by veterans, is filled with the memorials of the war.

Aside from these attractions, which place Washington beyond comparison as a place of interest to the soldier of the Union, the city offers inducements which no other city can equal. Its famous streets and avenues, broad and beautifully shaded, with 200 miles of asphalt pavements, offer unrivaled facilities for marching. Spacious and well-kept hotels provide an accommodation for a vast army. There are a thousand objects of interest here, aside from war memorials, which would make a visit to the capital something to be remembered with the keenest pleasure.

The railroad companies propose a series of excursions to the battlefields and places of note surrounding Washington, and have agreed to reduce their rates to the very minimum.

The hotels and boarding-houses, with which Washington is better supplied than any other city in the country, have agreed not to advance prices beyond regular rates, so that no fear need be entertained of any extortion or imposition upon our visitors on the part of hotels, restaurants, boarding-houses, or anyone else.

The citizens offer a hearty welcome to their splendid city, and it can be safely predicted that if the encampment is held here amid such impressive surroundings it will be the most notable reunion of veterans of any war ever held in any city of the world.

Executive Committee.

This invitation was signed by the District Commissioners and the invitation committee.

The CHAIRMAN. This invitation was extended by the citizens of Washington.

Mr. EDSON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What business interests were represented?

Mr. EDSON. The interest is general by all the citizens.

The CHAIRMAN. Can you indicate some of the business interests represented?

Mr. EDSON. All the railroads, hotels, the business men, merchants, lawyers, doctors, and all the business interests generally located in the city. I have lived here twenty-eight years, and I have never seen more interest manifested in anything at any time than was exhibited in this movement when it was proposed in Washington.

The CHAIRMAN. I notice in the Star of August 1 a copy of the silver engraved invitations, together with the portraits as well as the names of the invitation committee, from which it appears that the railroad interests, the real-estate interests, the legal profession, newspapers, merchants, hotels, restaurants, contractors, etc., were all represented. In the invitation it is stated that "as an earnest of our hospitable intentions an ample guaranty fund has been subscribed for the encampment for the usual expenses of such assemblages." Will you kindly give to the committee the amount of that guaranty fund?

Mr. EDSON. We stated it was a $50,000 guaranty fund. It was forty-nine thousand and some hundred dollars.

The CHAIRMAN. All solvent?

Mr. EDSON. Yes, sir; except as to those who have died or gone out of business since.

The CHAIRMAN. What additional sums, if any, have been subscribed since that time?

Mr. EDSON. We have not raised anything in addition to that.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you made any effort to do so?

Mr. EDSON. Yes, sir; we have, but not to increase it above that. We see now we have got to do it.

The CHAIRMAN. Can you state the expense connected with the encampment at Detroit?

Mr. EDSON. It was $28,000.

The CHAIRMAN. How was that amount provided?

Mr. EDSON. Fifty thousand dollars was appropriated by the city and $30,000 was raised by subscription. $12,000 of which was returned.

The CHAIRMAN. Did the city, by its municipal authorities, extend the invitation to the encampment?

Mr. EDSON. The mayor and the rest of the municipal government extended the invitation.

The CHAIRMAN. How was the $28,000 for the encampment at Boston provided?

Mr. EDSON. Fifty thousand dollars was appropriated by the State of Massachusetts and $25,000 by the city of Boston and turned over to the executive committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Then, as I understand you, $75,000 of the $28,000 was contributed by the State of Massachusetts and the city of Boston, whilst $13,000 was raised by individual subscription?

Mr. EDSON. There were four funds. One was by the city; one was by the State; $13,000 was given outright by the prominent men of the community, and there was a guaranty fund.

Mr. HATTON. I would like to state as to Detroit that after the State Assemblies made the appropriation the governor vetoed it, and within three or four weeks of the time of the meeting of the encampment the citizens raised the amount promised by the State and which they would have received except for the veto of the governor.

Mr. HENDERSON (to Mr. EDSON). Do you know what Milwaukee did?

Mr. EDSON. The city appropriated $50,000 direct and the expenses were not quite $50,000. There was a brewer, I think his name was Schlitz, who provided a part of the entertainment at his expense, the cost of which was several thousand dollars, but I do not remember the amount. All of the legitimate expense was paid out of the $50,000 and there was no subscription fund.

Mr. HENDERSON. How about St. Louis?

Mr. EDSON. There was no city or State appropriation. The amount was all raised by private subscription.

Mr. HENDERSON. How much?

Mr. EDSON. Ninety-six thousand dollars.

The CHAIRMAN. When you spoke of an "ample guaranty fund," what amount had you in mind?

Mr. EDSON. Fifty thousand dollars.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you at that time know what it cost to entertain the encampment at Boston?

Mr. EDSON. Speaking for myself, I admit I did not.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you know at that time what it cost at Milwaukee?

Mr. EDSON. So far as I was concerned I did not know what it had cost anywhere when the invitation was extended.

Mr. HENDERSON. I suppose you thought you had enough subscribed to put it on a winning basis?

Mr. EDSON. Yes, sir; it was to be a guaranty fund, or earnest money.

The CHAIRMAN. Was that amount intended only as the initiative proceeding as to subscriptions?

Mr. EDSON. We expected that that would be all that we would have to expend, so far as subscriptions were concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. You state that you did not know the amount expended at other places when the invitation was extended?

Mr. EDSON. Speaking for myself, I did not.

The CHAIRMAN. Was the question of the amount required in issue at Detroit, or did you subsequently ascertain what would be necessary?

Mr. EDSON. I did not learn anything about the expenses.

The CHAIRMAN. You visited Detroit?

Mr. EDSON. Yes; as a member of the invitation committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Was the question of amount raised there?

Mr. EDSON. I do not remember.

The CHAIRMAN. Was it not a matter of newspaper comment?

Mr. EDSON. It was. I do not know that I heard any amount mentioned.

The CHAIRMAN. Was not the amount referred to in the Detroit edition of the Washington Post?

Mr. EDSON. Perhaps Mr. Hatton can answer that. I will say what I thought would be right as to the amount. After I was elected to the chairmanship of this committee one of the Grand Army men came to me and handed me a book giving the expenses at the different cities. I was never more astonished in my life than when I learned of the vast amount of labor and expense entailed. That was the first time I realized the magnitude of the thing.

Mr. HENDERSON. Did not the Grand Army take the initiative here in Washington, and did they not make representations as to what the cost would be?

Mr. EDSON. They said $50,000 would be ample.

Mr. HENDERSON. You felt justified in relying upon their representations.

Mr. EDSON. Mr. Pipes spoke for them and they said $50,000 would be enough. Others said it would take more. The impression I got was that $50,000 would be enough to guarantee the ordinary expenses.

The CHAIRMAN. What did Lincoln, Nebr., promise?

Mr. EDSON. Everything you could think of.

The CHAIRMAN. As to the amount she would guarantee?

Mr. EDSON. They offered everything free.

The CHAIRMAN. They proposed to entertain the encampment without cost?

Mr. EDSON. Yes, sir; to provide quarters and everything.

The CHAIRMAN. Do I understand you to say that you have made no increase in your subscription list?

Mr. EDSON. We are going to do it.

The CHAIRMAN. I mean since the encampment decided to come here?

Mr. EDSON. When we returned we organized our regular committees. We divided it up, and different committees had charge of different things. We selected a different man to take charge of the finance committee, and we started out to get these subscriptions that had been given or promised before. They gave a regular signature and agreement to pay this money; whereas I went around to the banks and others, and they would say, "Put me down for so much," and I would put them down without their signature, though I knew it was perfectly good. The new chairman went around to get the subscriptions confirmed. So far he has got $40,000; but there is no difficulty about it. We can get $100,000, or whatever we think necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. What amount will be necessary to entertain the encampment?

Mr. EDSON. I have got my figures made, and the lowest possible amount is $150,000. If we had $100,000 more we could spend it.

The CHAIRMAN. I mean on the basis of a reasonable and proper expenditure?

Mr. EDSON. In Boston they accommodated 10,400 veterans in what they called free quarters. It is impossible to find quarters. These different cities have expended money for sleeping quarters. Outside of Boston there were about 35,000 more veterans accommodated. Those accommodations cost in Boston $54,000; in the city of Boston it cost $23,000, and the suburban towns and cities made up the balance. In Detroit they accommodated 38,000 soldiers, at a cost of $44,000. In Columbus they accommodated nearly 40,000, at a cost of $54,000.

Mr. HENDERSON. Did the city of Columbus appropriate any money? Mr. EDSON. They raised it through an exhibition fund and the Board of Trade. I never found out exactly how they raised the money there, though I have tried.

Mr. HENDERSON. Does your committee realize that this is going to be the largest encampment ever held on the continent?

Mr. EDSON. We have located some 300 posts, comprising probably 25,000 men, and in every instance where we have asked how many men they had at Boston, Detroit, Columbus, etc., the number they say is coming here is two to six times as many as went to the other cities. The number is appalling. Quarters will have to be furnished. We will have more than 100,000 soldiers.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you mean that this expense at Boston, to which you have just referred, is additional to the $88,000 first mentioned?

Mr. EDSON. No. Mr. COGSWELL. It is an item of the expense. The CHAIRMAN. Eighty-eight thousand dollars covered this charge? Mr. EDSON. Out of this $88,000 $23,000 went for quarters in the city, but outside of the city 30,000 were accommodated, the money for which did not enter into that expenditure for Boston proper, as the suburbs paid for that. It is estimated at $25,000.

The CHAIRMAN. When you spoke of an "ample guaranty fund" you had in mind $50,000 as a sufficient amount to entertain the Grand Army?

Mr. EDSON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. In that amount you did not contemplate any contribution from the District of Columbia or the Government of the United States?

Mr. EDSON. I will say that as far as I was concerned (I do not speak for the other members of the committee) I thought whatever in excess of that was required we would ask for out of the same fund out of which we pay for the schools or the fire department. We thought we would go first to the President for his recommendation and then come to you as our board of aldermen or common council.

The CHAIRMAN. You would not ask for it out of the funds of the District alone.

Mr. EDSON. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You expected to ask the United States for half of it.

Mr. EDSON. Yes, sir; just as the other expenses are paid.

The CHAIRMAN. Has the United States paid any part of the expense of the encampment at any other place?

Mr. EDSON. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And have never been asked to do so?

Mr. EDSON. No, sir.

Mr. HENDERSON. No encampment has ever been held where the United States held so much property territory.

The CHAIRMAN. I understand you to say that you returned from Detroit familiar as to what you thought would be the aggregate expense, and that you estimated $50,000 to be necessary and ample.

Mr. EDSON. We thought so, if no extraordinary expense was necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. Did your committee at any formal session prior to the location of the encampment take action looking to a contribution on the part of the Government?

Mr. EDSON. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Was any proposition made at any meeting of the executive committee to that effect?

Mr. EDSON. Not until after we came back and organized.

The CHAIRMAN. Was that discussed?

Mr. EDSON. No, sir; I do not think it was. Our whole energy was bent on extending the invitation and getting it under way.

The CHAIRMAN. Then I understand that at no meeting of the committee was there any discussion as to whether a contribution would be asked for out of the revenues of the District or out of the Government revenues?

Mr. HENDERSON. The final details were postponed until after the encampment was located.

Mr. EDSON. Necessarily.

The CHAIRMAN. You are chairman of the executive committee?

Mr. EDSON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What are the powers and duties of the executive committee—the general conduct of the encampment?

Mr. EDSON. That was not organized until two months afterward.

The CHAIRMAN. When I spoke of the executive committee, in its relation to the invitation, I should have said the invitation committee?

Mr. EDSON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. When was this executive committee organized?

Mr. EDSON. I can not give the exact date, but I think it was in November about two months after we came back.

The CHAIRMAN. When was the first proposition formally made to apply to the Government?

Mr. EDSON. It was first made in the executive committee in January or February.

The CHAIRMAN. But in the mean time you had made no additional effort to secure subscriptions?

Mr. EDSON. We made efforts to confirm them and get them into proper shape.

The CHAIRMAN. You had not gone out to seek any additional subscriptions?

Mr. EDSON. The finance committee have got them all, except where some of the subscribers have gone out of business or died. They sent circulars to other people. We have got to run the subscription list up to more than $50,000 even if we get this $100,000.

Mr. HENDERSON. I want to ask about railroad facilities, and whether or not that matter has been arranged with the transportation companies.

Mr. EDSON. The chairman of that committee, Mr. Parke, is here and can answer that question.

Mr. PARKE. The lines have practically agreed to one fare for the round trip, except that west of Chicago and east of Pittsburg, they have granted rates of little over a cent a mile, which is less than one fare for the round trip. It makes the fare $16.25 from Chicago for the round trip.

Mr. HENDERSON. Do you remember what the rates were to Detroit?

Mr. PARKE. There was considerable trouble about that. The different associations did not take any action until within a short time before the meeting of the encampment. It was practically one fare for the round trip.

Mr. HENDERSON. Is the rate you have secured for Washington practically what we had at Boston and other points?

Mr. PARKE. It is better than the rates we have had for any other encampment.

Mr. HENDERSON. I want to say that there will be thousands and tens of thousands of men here that have not been here before. You have got to cut your cloth accordingly. The veterans want to see these battlefields and the capital of their country, and you must provide for them.

Mr. PARKE. Contracts have been made that would indicate that.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. It is only a question of how many people the railroads can carry. That is the only limit.

Mr. HENDERSON. You must take extra precautions in reference to baggage?

Mr. WORTHINGTON. We will recommend them not to bring so much baggage, except satchels.

Mr. PARKE. That recommendation has been made before without avail.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, let me read you something penned by the gifted editor of the Post of date July 31: "The people of Washington are ready with the funds needed." That sounds well.

Mr. HENDERSON. Gen. Alger told me that outside of the subscriptions it cost the citizens thirty to forty thousand dollars for decorations at Detroit.

The CHAIRMAN. Again, on the 21 of August, the Post says: "Ample funds have been guaranteed for entertainment, and additional funds are already assured." Now, without multiplying quotations (I have one here from the Star and others from the Post), I suppose that it will not be denied that assurances were abundant that ample funds had been provided, and that the city would accommodate, with lavish hospitality, the veterans who might attend the encampment.

I especially desire to note this extract from an editorial in the Star, after the encampment was located here:

"Washington will carry out its pledges next year, and will contribute to make the encampment of 1892 for the veterans the most memorable of all its encampments."

Mr. HENDERSON. They do not say how it is to be done.

The CHAIRMAN. This declaration was doubtless predicated upon the statement that an "ample guaranty fund" had been provided.

Mr. HENDERSON. I especially desire to note this statement that in the absence of any definite knowledge he thought $50,000 would be sufficient.

Mr. EDSON. We expected it would be.

Mr. S. B. HEGE. I was one of the gentlemen appointed on the part of the citizens' committee, which held a meeting to inaugurate the matter; and we conferred with some gentlemen from the Grand Army of the Republic. Our committee had an advisory committee to confer with five of their most prominent members, representing the Grand Army of the Republic; and it was from those five people that we got the $50,000 idea.

That was where the $50,000 idea originated. They said "We can entertain here for less than they can elsewhere, for the reason that we have so many public buildings, and matters of that character that were of general interest to the old soldiers; and in consequence of that, we will be relieved from many of the entertainments that the other cities have to inaugurate." I want to make an explanation also on another point in reply to the question as to the general aid that the people have given.

Col. Staples, Mr. Parke, and myself canvassed Pennsylvania avenue from Fifteenth street to the Peace Monument. We went into every business place on the avenue, and during our entire trip we were only refused subscriptions by one single firm, and we had no subscriptions of less than $5.

Mr. HENDERSON. I will ask a question, and any one of you gentlemen can answer it. Are you not yourselves, after ascertaining by correspondence as to what will probably be the attendance at the encampment, and what the cost will be, as to how much will be necessary to properly provide for and entertain this encampment?

Mr. EDSON. I stated awhile ago that in every case where we have inquired of encampments, we have found that there will be from two to six or eight times as many soldiers who will attend, from every post, than have heretofore attended any previous encampment. We take it that there will be 150,000 or 200,000 Grand Army men.

In every other city where encampments have been held, with every soldier came two or more visitors—father, son, or wife.

We assume that there will be over 400,000 people in Washington that week; and, as I attempted to illustrate awhile ago, suppose we have 100,000 soldiers for whom you must furnish shelter. That can not be obtained in private houses; and it would cost, say, as much as it cost the other cities, which will be less than $1.25 each to furnish free quarters for four days or during the time they stay. It can not be done for less, and I doubt whether we shall be able to do it at as low figures as it was done at Boston and Detroit, because Detroit is in the neighborhood of manufacturing, being a lumber region, while Washington is not a commercial city. We have got more to contend with here than in the other cities; but we are going to work. We have more to raise than $50,000, for I do not see how it is going to cost less than $200,000.

The CHAIRMAN. You are not including in this estimate anybody but soldiers?

Mr. EDSON. No, sir; we include only veterans.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the number of soldiers in attendance at Detroit?

Mr. EDSON. It is estimated there were about 45,000 soldiers in Detroit. Quarters were furnished for 35,000, and quarters were furnished for the same number at Boston. A great many of the members of these posts will not go to the free quarters, but prefer the hotels and halls and private houses, and the like.

Mr. COMPTON. Do you mean to say that the total estimate of 100,000 was of soldiers present or to be provided?

Mr. EDSON. To be provided for. It will be at least that number. From all accounts I would not be surprised if there would be a hundred and twenty thousand here who will want quarters.

The CHAIRMAN. You do not provide for anyone else?

Mr. EDSON. No, sir; these are soldiers not asked to pay for their own accommodation.

You must not regard this in the light of pauperism. That is not the idea at all. The different States have extended this invitation out of consideration for the veterans. It is almost impossible to find quarters in private houses. If you take this city, we have 232,000 population in the whole District. Of that number about 77,000 are colored people, who are not able, for the most part, to do anything, even for their own color. That leaves the population, 155,000 people who can contribute.

The CHAIRMAN. We all understand that there is no question of "pauperism" connected with this issue. My own little city at a district encampment entertained 25,000 people last year, several thousand of whom were old soldiers. I presume no one will question the fact that these soldiers ought to be hospitably entertained. They should be entertained upon the terms of your invitation. Parsimony should be avoided. The only question, therefore, is: Who shall pay the expense? Your executive committee was, as I am advised, organized in January or February last, and I will now ask you to state when the first suggestion was made that Federal aid should be solicited.

Mr. EDSON. The first formal suggestion was made at that time. We knew long before that that would be compelled to ask aid.

The CHAIRMAN. It was understood by your invitation committee?

Commissioner DOUGLASS. It was discussed on the way home. The CHAIRMAN. There are "three horns" to this dilemma. The first is whether the citizens shall be required to pay the expense of the encampment; second, whether the Congress of the United States shall pay it in connection with the District of Columbia; third, whether the amount shall be appropriated from the revenues of the District of Columbia. As I understand it, you ask that this $100,000 be appropriated by the Government?

Mr. EDSON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You do not ask the $100,000 to be paid out of your own revenues?

Mr. EDSON. We think it should be paid out of the same revenue as for municipal expenses.

Mr. HENDERSON. You consider the Government as a citizen of the District in that case?

Mr. EDSON. The city of Berlin, which is, perhaps the best governed city on earth, assesses the Government property, and it thereby pays its share of the revenues, which exceed 50 per cent.

Mr. HENDERSON. National property is exempt from taxation here.

Mr. EDSON. Yes, sir; half of the children attending the schools of this District are children of the employees of the Government; and it was proposed, in former years, that the Government were to pay part of that expense.

The CHAIRMAN. It is true that Government property is exempt from taxation; but the District pays taxes at the rate of $2.98 on the $100 worth of property, including the Government's share, the tax rate being second to only one city in the United States—Chicago. One-half of the total revenue is provided by the General Government.

Mr. EDSON. Many cities pay too much taxes.

Mr. HENDERSON. We should expect, and I hope that every American citizen does expect, that this city should present phases, improvements, and appearances second to no city, and of course that must cost money. It is the capital city of a great people, and all should expect its appearance to be worthy of the nation's greatness.

The CHAIRMAN. I quite agree with you that there is a necessity for a large expenditure of money in conducting the administration of the nation's capital.

Mr. HATTON. It was stated in the Senate that this invitation was extended solely by the citizens of this District. As I understand it, the invitation was extended by the citizens and by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, who are not only officers of the city but of the Government.

I think, when the turn of the tide in the selection of the encampment was made, it was made by about one thousand men who had the deciding of this matter. Those one thousand men are prominent ones, pretty well to do; and I think if it had not been for outside pressure from the veterans, perhaps the encampment would not have come to Washington, because there was a feeling outside that certain elements might be subverted. The pressure in favor of Washington was finally brought to bear by the veterans. This invitation was signed by the executive officers of the District of Columbia in their official capacity, and they were supplemented by the citizens of Washington.

The CHAIRMAN. I do not object to the form of the invitation.

Mr. HATTON. It has been stated that it was entirely from storekeepers and boarding houses.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have a distinct recollection that the Commissioners were represented at Detroit.

The CHAIRMAN. I desire in this connection to read a brief extract from the Star: "It represents not only the business men of the city who guarantee an ample fund, but also the government of the District of Columbia—seemingly a very proper proceeding—" in the person of Commissioner Douglass. The veterans recognize that he represents the majesty and might of the District of Columbia. As president of the board of District Commissioners he may be said to be mayor of the city."

It seems to be proper that the Commissioners should join in the invitation, and, to put the question on "all fours" with Boston and other cities it would also seem that Washington should from her own revenues supplement the individual subscriptions.

Mr. HENDERSON. Are there any other suggestions that your committee desire to add in the way of observations? If so, you can do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The members of the committee cordially invite suggestions from any gentleman present.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. I am one of the subcommittee on legislation, and I am a member of the executive committee.

Mr. DOUGLASS. Mr. Worthington was late District attorney.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. I want to speak of another matter of the utmost importance, and that is the language of the bill as it comes from the Senate. The Senate has added a novel feature, and one that will require careful consideration, and that is, that the appropriation of this $100,000 shall be for subsistence and quarters. This is the first time it has ever been undertaken to provide for the veterans food as well as a place to sleep. It is utterly impossible to provide quarters at less than $1.25 a day each; and that will only provide a board roof and a wisp of straw on which to sleep.

The CHAIRMAN. You assert that this is the first time an effort has been made to provide subsistence?

Mr. WORTHINGTON. They never had rations free before. It will work in two ways. In the first place, it will double the expenses, because subsistence will cost as much as lodging. And another way in which it will act will be to double the attendance. This act will be sent to every Grand Army post in less than two weeks after the bill passes.

According to this they will be provided with quarters and subsistence, and all that they will have to do will be to pay car fare. But if it is done, you will have to double the appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. This language, then, is not what you recommend?

Mr. WORTHINGTON. It is not.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you read what the executive committee did recommend?

Mr. WORTHINGTON. As chairman of the committee on legislation I prepared this bill. I had it in this way: "That the sum of $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated to pay for the proper and legitimate expenses of the encampment, including receptions and entertainment of such old soldiers as may attend," etc. The bill, as it was sent to the Senate, did not have anything except quarters. Afterwards the provision for subsistence was put in.

Mr. COMPTON. What do you mean by entertainment?

Mr. WORTHINGTON. There are twenty or thirty items. Mr. Edson has items of the expenditure at Detroit, Boston, and other places. They are little things which it is impossible to enumerate. At these other cities they gave a formal dinner to the delegates to the encampment, which cost from $8,000 to $15,000. We propose to omit that, in order to avoid the expense. We will omit that and have a reception in the Pension Building, which will not cost more than one-half what this public dinner would cost. We would like to be able to give the dinner; but we do not think we can do it. The fact is that this matter has overgrown the anticipations of everybody who went to Detroit. Even if the citizens did go to Detroit and make these promises, they were accepted. They had no idea at that time of the mass of people who would come here, simply because it is the capital city of the nation. The old veterans marched down Pennsylvania avenue in 1895, and went again to march in 1897.

Mr. HENDERSON. The estimates they have made were based upon previous encampments?

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Yes, sir; the estimates were made accordingly. But circumstances here will not be what they were at Boston and Detroit. We had the exact amount expended at Milwaukee at that time.

The CHAIRMAN. Without mentioning names, will you give the amount of the largest subscription? I note the statement of the Post that the subscriptions ranged from $5 to $250.

Mr. EDSON. Two thousand five hundred dollars was the largest subscription. That was by the Pennsylvania Railroad.

Mr. STAPLES. The expenses of our committee that went to Detroit were less by about three-fourths than those of any other committee that ever went to any place to invite an encampment.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. If we are also to provide subsistence as well as quarters, $150,000 will not begin to do it. It will take $250,000. We would like to have the committee make the appropriation $300,000. If subsistence is added and the appropriation is not increased, we will be lost. We will have to advertise for visitors not to come.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the only change desired in the phraseology of the Senate amendment?

Mr. WORTHINGTON. I would like to have it left so that the expenditure under the Secretary of War will have a little margin, say one-fourth, or something like that—quarters and subsistence. That is the only change in the phraseology, so that the word subsistence will not be there, and the men will not expect to be quartered and fed.

Mr. HENDERSON. I understand that the Senator who offered that had no experience with these encampments?

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Yes, sir; the Senator had no information on the subject, and he would have changed it himself if he had known the circumstances.

Commissioner DOUGLASS. I went to Detroit as chairman of the committee on encampments. The inception of this movement was a call for a meeting of the citizens of Washington of all business of all kinds. At that meeting we appointed a committee, and we went to Detroit; and when we returned we made a report. Then an executive committee was appointed. Men were appointed upon that committee who could take the most interest in the whole subject. They were selected with that end in view. That was why some men who might seem to have had axes to grind were on the committee; but there was nothing of that kind in it, as we simply chose men who would be certain to do the work without regard to business or anything else, and do it as a courtesy to the Grand Army. If you have a job of work to do, you have got to have the tools to do it to enable you to do it. There were other questions than the question of expense. The main thought we had was to secure the encampment here.

As to the amount of money, we called in four or five members of the Grand Army who had had experience in encampments, and they said $50,000, and not less, would be sufficient. We looked around and visited a number of citizens, and we got the subscription. That was the idea I had; and that was all I knew about it. I had not previously had my attention directed to the matter of expense. We said we would have a guaranty fund of $50,000, supposing it would be enough. It was thought that that would be ample. We got this information from men who knew as we thought. We had a lively time over it, and we talked to soldiers and became satisfied that more would be required.

The reason of the increased attendance which we expect is that this is the capital city of the nation and there are going to be five times as many old soldiers in attendance; certainly three or four times as many. That brought up the question of money. We saw that there would have to be more money. This executive committee was formed, and it conferred with the citizens. We do not ask the Government to bear three or four times the expense that the citizens do, but we reverse it. Instead of asking the General Government to bear two-thirds of the expense, we ask it to bear only one-third.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Besides what will be spent privately?

Commissioner DOUGLASS. Of course, as one of the District Commissioners, I would like to save all this money for roads and bridges. The citizen will pay about two-thirds, and the Government should pay one-third. The attendance will be large, simply because this is the capital of the nation.

The CHAIRMAN. As president of the Board of District Commissioners you were chairman of the invitation committee, but you understood at the time, of course, that you could not, by your action, impose any liability upon the District?

Commissioner DOUGLASS. No, sir; neither directly nor indirectly.

The CHAIRMAN. You put this proposition to defray the expenses of the encampment at Washington on a little different footing than at other places. If the encampment were to go to Kansas City you would not think that the Government ought to pay any part of the expense of its entertainment there?

Commissioner DOUGLASS. There is no national feature there.

Mr. HENDERSON. You did that because of the recognized principle that Government property is largely represented here.

Commissioner DOUGLASS. Yes, sir; there was a sentiment outside of that.

The CHAIRMAN. This invitation was extended by the District of Columbia and the citizens of Washington. To whom? To the members of the Grand Army of the Republic who meet here in annual session. Then, would not the practical effect of imposing one-half of the liability upon the Government be to entail in part, at least, the expense of the encampment upon your guests and make them pay the cost of their own entertainment?

Commissioner DOUGLASS. Yes, sir; you might refine reasons that way. In that way you do lay the responsibility everywhere in this world.

Mr. HENDERSON. No visitor will object to fair and liberal provisions.

Mr. HATTON. We tax them for our schoolhouses now.

Mr. COGSWELL. I move we close the hearing.

Mr. HENDERSON. I will ask that you gentlemen confer and send to Mr. DOCKERY such an amendment as you propose.

Mr. COMPTON. Does your proposition indicate the instrumentality by which this money is to be expended?

Mr. EDSON. Yes, sir; the exact language of the bill as we submitted it to the President and the President transmitted it, is the same, except the Secretary of War is substituted for the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. COMPTON. Would it not be better to substitute the General of the Army for the Secretary of War?

Mr. WORTHINGTON. I think that the Secretary of War would intrust that to the General of the Army. We would have full confidence in the Secretary of War or General of the Army.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Secretary of War, if he is named, will be limited by the provisions of the bill. He will be compelled to see that the money is expended according to the act. There will be a necessity to liberalize the language of the Senate.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. That is our idea.

Mr. EDSON. I have read you the names. You will find in them fifty of the best citizens we have. They are men who disburse every month three or four times the amount of money that is involved in this whole thing.

The CHAIRMAN. No one makes any criticism upon the personnel of the committee.

Mr. EDSON. We would like, as these details have got to be attended to quickly, to have the committee deal liberally with us, because we do not want to be compelled to go through the red tape, especially of the Department. It would cost more and would give us trouble. I hope, therefore, you will be liberal with the committee in this respect. We are going to try not to expend a dollar unnecessarily. No contract can be signed except by the chairman.

Mr. HENDERSON. Could you tell us the terms of the appropriations by the city councils of Boston and Detroit?

Mr. EDSON. In each instance the appropriation was handed over to the executive committee upon its receipt alone.

Mr. HENDERSON. Did the State of Massachusetts pursue that course?

Mr. EDSON. Yes, sir; the treasurer told me it was handed over upon his receipt. They took the money and disbursed it, I think, very economically.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you kindly frame such a proposition as you would like to have in the event the money shall be appropriated from the revenues of the District?

Mr. HENDERSON. I would be glad if you would give the phraseology of the acts of the State of Massachusetts and of the cities of Boston and Detroit.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the committee will stand adjourned.

CITIZENS' EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE,
TWENTY-SIXTH NATIONAL ENCAMPMENT, G. A. R.,
Washington, D. C., April 21, 1892.

DEAR SIR: In compliance with the request of the Subcommittee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives, contained in a letter of Mr. James C. Courts, clerk of your committee, dated April 16, 1892, I have the honor to submit the following reply, answering the questions propounded as fully as the information in our possession will admit:

1. Q. A statement showing the estimated number of persons who attended the encampments of the Grand Army of the Republic, at Boston, Detroit, Milwaukee, and St. Louis.

A. Boston, 45,000 Grand Army of the Republic, 150,000 other visitors; Detroit, 40,000 Grand Army of the Republic, 100,000 other visitors; Milwaukee, 30,000 Grand Army of the Republic, 100,000 other visitors; St. Louis, 40,000 Grand Army of the Republic, 100,000 other visitors. The estimate of the attendance at Milwaukee and St. Louis is based upon the figures of the expenses incurred for accommodations, etc.

2. Q. The number of Grand Army of the Republic veterans furnished with quarters at each of the said encampments, and the estimated cost of such quarters.

A. Detroit: $42,700 was the cost of quarters, and 37,000 men were accommodated. This is taken from their official report.

Boston: $23,047 was the cost of quarters, and 10,400 men were accommodated. No report is made of the number of veterans furnished quarters in the surrounding towns, but it is safely estimated that 25,000 men were quartered at a cost of at least $30,000.

Milwaukee: $30,042 is put down for "camps and barracks," but the number of men accommodated is not given. It is only estimated that they could not have quartered over 16,000 men. It may have been considerable more or less.

St. Louis: We have no other report than the total expenses; $90,000 was collected from subscriptions, $78,000 was expended, and $12,000 was paid to charity.

Columbus: Nearly 40,000 men were furnished quarters, and the cost is given at $54,000.

3. Q. An estimate of the number of persons that will probably attend the national encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic in this city, and the number of Grand Army of the Republic veterans that it will be necessary to furnish with quarters, and the estimated cost of the same.

A. From the most reliable information given us by members of the Grand Army of the Republic throughout the country, and from newspaper intelligence, a conservative estimate of the attendance here we put at not less than 100,000 veterans, and those for whom quarters will have to be provided we estimate at least 75,000, at a cost at from $95,000 to $100,000.

It will be observed that 75,000 men to be accommodated with quarters is much below the percentage of the number furnished quarters at Boston, Detroit, and Columbus. It would therefore seem that our estimate will prove to be below what will be required for quarters and the cost thereof.

4. Q. An estimate in detail of the expenses that will have to be borne by your committee on account of said encampment.

A. I inclose herewith a detailed statement of the disbursements for expenses at the encampments held in Milwaukee, Boston, and Detroit. Our committee have not been able to secure like statements from other cities further than their total expenses.

The estimate of the attendance in Washington of members of the Grand Army of the Republic and others being fixed at double or more the number that have attended any previous encampment, we consider an increase of 50 per cent over the expense required at any previous encampment as a conservative estimate. The citizens' executive committee have therefore concluded to raise $50,000 by subscription, and to ask for the appropriation of $100,000.

I am unable to furnish your committee with a detailed estimate of what our expenses will be, but we anticipate that they will be similar to those of other cities as indicated by the tabulated statement I have inclosed herewith of Milwaukee, Boston, and Detroit.

Some items, we contemplate, will be less, while others will be more; the items, however, for quarters will be the largest and most important.

5. Q. The amount of solvent subscriptions which have been made up to this date on the part of the citizens of the District of Columbia towards the expenses of this encampment, and the whole amount that you estimate will be subscribed for this object.

A. Forty-one thousand dollars is the amount of subscriptions made and confirmed to date, all of which is perfectly solvent, $30,250 of which has been paid in to our committee. These subscriptions will be, without question, not less than $50,000.

These subscriptions are made by 200 or 250 citizens. By appropriating the larger sum from the District of Columbia funds distributes the expense over the entire community, where it properly belongs.

6. Q. Copies of the laws and ordinances making appropriations on the part of States or municipalities toward the expenses of the encampments held at Boston, Detroit, Milwaukee, and St. Louis.

A. In St. Louis no appropriation was made by the city or State. We have written to the other cities to procure copies of the ordinances requested, but up to this time have not received them. As soon as they come into our possession we will forward them to your committee.

Very respectfully,

JOHN JOY EDSON, Chairman.

CITIZENS' EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE,
TWENTY-SIXTH NATIONAL ENCAMPMENT, G. A. R.,
Washington, D. C., April 21, 1892.

DEAR SIR: In accordance with the suggestion made by you at the conclusion of the hearing which your subcommittee recently gave to the citizens' executive committee having in charge the reception and entertainment of the Grand Army of the Republic in Washington in September next, a special meeting of the executive committee was held last Monday night for the purpose of considering and determining whether that committee ought to ask that the sum of $100,000 which we have requested Congress to appropriate in aid of the purpose for which our committee was organized, should be paid wholly from the revenues of the District of Columbia.

After a careful consideration of this matter, the committee by a unanimous vote came to the conclusion that it was constrained to adhere to its previous action in this matter, and we are accordingly instructed to ask Congress not to depart in this instance from the just and equitable arrangement provided for by the act of June 11, 1878, under which the municipal expenses of the District since that time have been met by equal contributions from the revenues of the District and the Treasury of the United States.

As to the proposition that the particular item of the District appropriation bill, now under consideration, should be made an exception to the general rule, we understand that this suggestion is made upon the grounds that the citizens of the District, through a committee which went to Detroit last year, and through the newspapers published in the city, invited the Grand Army to hold its next national encampment at the capital, and promised that if the invitation should be accepted the veterans who should come here would be properly entertained by the people of Washington. It seems to us, and to those whom we represent, that there are two satisfactory answers to this suggestion.

In the first place, it was well understood by everybody at Detroit that it has been the custom for a number of years past for the larger part of the expenditures incurred in the various cities where national encampments have been held to be met by appropriations from public funds. This was especially the case at the last two annual encampments, held at Boston in 1890, and at Detroit in 1891.

There was, therefore, no reason to suppose that the citizens of Washington would not ask for such an appropriation, and certainly nothing was said by the committee or through the press at the time which could properly authorize such a conclusion. The sole objection seems to be—as it is said—that we are asking the United States to help entertain those whom we have invited to be our guests. The error of this argument appears to us to be, that it assumes that we are asking Congress, as to this item of the District appropriation bill, to do more than it is in the habit of doing in regard to our municipal expenditures in general. If a special tax were to be levied upon all the property in the District to meet this particular expenditure, no reason occurs to us why the United States should not pay its proper proportion of the same. To single out this one item, and refuse governmental aid to it, would, we submit, be a discrimination against those who are peculiarly entitled to the favorable consideration of the Congress of the United States.

And in the second place, when the Grand Army was invited to hold its next national encampment here the people of Washington did not anticipate that the attendance would be materially greater at the encampment to be held here than it had been at other national encampments. But when it became generally known that the next reunion of the old soldiers was to be held at the capital it soon became manifest that the attendance would be very much larger than at any previous meeting. This results from several causes. There has never been such an encampment held in Washington since the war, and it is not likely that another will be held here until the survivors of the war shall be few in numbers. It is therefore understood that this is to be the first and the last time that the veterans of the war shall assemble at the capital of the country. As a part of the proceedings here there will be a parade upon Pennsylvania avenue. Thousands of soldiers participated in the grand review which was held here at the close of the war, and it is now evident that every survivor wishes to come to Washington and once more march down the avenue.

Many of the camping grounds and great battlefields of the war are at our door, and those who lived in the camps and participated in the battles naturally wish to avail themselves of this opportunity to visit those memorable scenes. And besides, simply because Washington is the capital of the United States and has become a beautiful and attractive city and contains the great public buildings of the nation, thousands of veterans will take advantage of the low rates offered by the railroads to see, in many cases for the first time, the capital of this country. It is now clear to everybody that not less than 100,000 soldiers will come to Washington in September, and the number is likely to be much larger. The total attendance of soldiers and others will, the indications are, be limited only by the carrying capacity of the railroads which lead into Washington. And as this unusual and unexpected increase in the attendance is due to the fact that the encampment is to be held at the capital, and the gathering thus assumes more of a national character, it is altogether reasonable and fitting that a part of the expenses should be borne by the General Government.

In accordance with your further request, we beg to say that we think it much better that the wording of this appropriation, as it passed the Senate, should be changed so that no part of the money will have to be spent for subsistence, and so that if it should turn out that the comfort of our guests could be better provided for by spending of some of the money for some purpose other than quarters, we would have authority to do so—subject, of course, to the provision that the whole sum is to be spent under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of War. At no national encampment of the Grand Army, as we are advised, has it been attempted to provide the soldiers with food. And to do so, in this instance, properly, would require that the amount to be appropriated should be, at least, doubled. The word "subsistence" was inserted in the Senate, we think, by inadvertence.

And it is manifest, we think, that the money should not be appropriated absolutely and solely for quarters. It is quite likely that the whole amount may have to be used in that way, but that can not definitely be determined until shortly before the time of the encampment, when we will know, at least approximately, what the attendance is likely to be.

In accordance with these views we suggest that the item in question, as it passed the Senate, shall be amended by striking out the words "subsistence and quarters for" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "reception and entertainment of."

This will conform to the language of the bill as originally prepared by our committee, recommended by the Commissioners of the District, and favorably submitted to Congress by the President, as will appear from a copy of Executive Document No. 173, of the present session of the House of Representatives, which we inclose.

Permit us in conclusion to thank you, and the members of the subcommittee of which you are chairman, for the courteous manner in which you have met us and those associated with us in this matter.

Very respectfully,

JNO. JOY EDSON,

Chairman Citizens' Executive Committee.

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

PROTEST FROM FARRAGUT POST, NO. 25, GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC, OF LINCOLN, NEBR.

At a regular meeting of Farragut Post, No. 25, Grand Army of the Republic, Lincoln, Neb., held April 9, 1892, the following resolutions and preamble were adopted:

Whereas, at the national encampment held in Detroit, Mich., September, 1891, the city of Washington was the successful competitor for the encampment in 1892; and

Whereas said city of Washington by its written agreement, by its written proposition, promised and agreed to entertain said encampment and furnish all things necessary, as per its schedule in writing filed with its proposition, which said promise and agreement were accepted by said encampment and believed to have been made in good faith; and

Whereas it has come to our knowledge that said city of Washington is now asking for a large appropriation from the national Treasury wherewith to pay the expenses of said encampment, which is not in accord with the promise and agreement of the said city of Washington upon which it secured the location of said encampment; and

Whereas there are still hundreds and thousands of honorably discharged Union soldiers who are unable to earn a comfortable living, are suffering from necessities of life, notwithstanding the liberality and generosity of our Government; and

Whereas, if said appropriation is made, or any appropriation is made, for the object for which it is asked, it will establish a dangerous and expensive precedent, which will in time become a great drain upon our national resources, absorbing funds that are needed and might better be applied to the support of aged indigent soldiers: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That we are opposed to the said appropriation, or any appropriation for the object stated, either in favor of the city of Washington or any other locality for the same purpose; and we most respectfully ask our honorable Senators and Representatives in Congress to oppose said appropriation and all others of its kind.

And be it further resolved, That we approve the firm and manly course pursued by our honorable Senator, A. S. PADDOCK, in said matter, and we hereby tender him a vote of thanks, assuring him that we believe with him, that said appropriation, if made, would be an injustice to other localities, and not in the interests of our honorable indigent ex-soldiers.

And be it further resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to the National Tribune, with the request that they be published, and that a copy be sent to each of our honorable Senators and Representatives in Congress.

L. M. SCOTHORN, Commander.

T. B. BEACH, Adjutant.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege, and I send to the desk a newspaper paragraph taken from the Washington Post of April 14, which I ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

REPRESENTATIVE BAILEY LEARNS A LESSON.

Mr. BAILEY of Texas was given a lesson in parliamentary tactics yesterday morning. It will be remembered that he has repeatedly objected to the passage of measures without a quorum. He asked unanimous consent for the passage of a bill granting to the Gainesville, Oklahoma and Gulf Railroad Company the right of way through Indian Territory. No quorum voted, to which Mr. CHIPMAN of Michigan called attention. The yeas and nays were demanded, and this vote resulted—136 yeas to 3 nays, many members on each side refusing to vote. Mr. BAILEY said he did not desire to have the measure passed without a quorum.

Mr. HOLMAN then demanded a call of the House, which disclosed 194 members present.

Mr. CHIPMAN again asked for the yeas and nays, but being appealed to by Mr. CULBERSON of Texas withdrew the request, and the bill was finally passed on a division, which did not show a quorum, but Mr. BAILEY made no objection.

The obstruction was interspersed simply to give Mr. BAILEY an object lesson in the parliamentary school which he has just entered. The incident created considerable amusement and consumed nearly two hours' time.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to notice this or any of the other criticisms which the public prints have seen fit to publish against me, but friends of ripe experience and upon whose judgment I rely implicitly have thought that inasmuch as I am charged with bad faith in this—that I am willing to pass my own bills under circumstances such as I would not permit the bills of other gentlemen to pass—that it is proper for me to make a statement. It is well known to every man who has given a second thought to this question that I have never insisted upon a quorum voting, though I do not hesitate to say that such a position would be entirely reasonable.

All that I have ever demanded in any case is that a quorum shall be present, and three minutes before the passage of the bill mentioned in that paragraph a call of the House had disclosed the presence of 194 members. While it is true that a quorum did not vote, there was a quorum present; and I repeat that that is all I have ever demanded. I have seen bills pass here many times when less than a dozen men voted, but the quorum was present and I offered no objection. I saw one bill carrying almost $25,000,000, for the support of the Army, pass when less than 25 men voted for it, but the quorum was present and the bill was passed.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him how he ascertained the fact that there was a quorum present on the occasion to which he referred?

Mr. BAILEY. I imitated the Speaker who presided over the preceding House of Representatives, and sine a quorum. [Laughter.] But, Mr. Speaker, I am less concerned about the newspaper's opinion on this point than I am about the imputation—

Mr. WALKER. I would like to ask the gentleman how he could tell there was a quorum unless he counted.

Mr. BAILEY. Oh, you will have time to talk in a few minutes on a case of your own, and you had better wait. [Laughter.]

I was about to say, Mr. Speaker, that I am less concerned about the opinion of the newspaper than I am about its imputation that my attitude on this question has excited such hostility among my fellow members as to bring down upon my head their revengeful spite; and it is upon this suggestion that I crave a brief indulgence this morning.

Mr. Speaker, in pursuing what I have conscientiously believed to be my duty, I have studied to avoid giving offense to my colleagues. I have sought with especial care to guard against raising anything like a personal issue in this Hall. I have fully realized from the very beginning that my position was somewhat of an innovation, and consequently one of difficulty and embarrassment, and that not even the most scrupulous regard for the rights and feelings of others could exempt me altogether from resentment.

But, sir, while I knew as well when I entered upon this course of conduct as I know to-day that it would subject me to many and unjust aspersions, yet I would hold myself unworthy to be the representative of a brave and free people if I could permit the hope of your favor or the fear of your censure to outweigh my sense of duty to them. [Applause.] I have acted deliberately in this matter, and I offer no apology for what I have done. I expected to be criticised, though the criticism exceeds my expectation. I did not anticipate so much bitterness, because I had supposed that the American House of Representatives was the one place above all others in the world where even an error of opinion would be safe from intolerance, and I am amazed, sir, at the impatience and the spirit of proscription which many gentlemen have exhibited against a position the correctness of which not one of them will have the temerity to deny.

It is true indeed that some of them have ventured to assert that while my contention may be right as a matter of abstract principle, it is wrong as a matter of policy. But, sir, I freely confess myself incapable of a mental process which can reach the conclusion that it is ever bad policy to follow a good principle. If it is right to legislate with less than a quorum, then it is wrong to arm any single man who lives with the power to prevent it; and it is doubly wrong to impose upon him the necessity of taking an oath to support, "without mental reservation or purpose of evasion," an instrument which plainly forbids it.

But, Mr. Speaker, it may be a matter of some surprise to these gentlemen who have been so swift to deal with me as a mere and confirmed obstructionist when I say that during my short service here I have never made a dilatory motion: I have never demanded a division or a roll call simply to delay the House and consume its time, and I have never refused unanimous consent for the consideration of any measure except such as have appeared to me to be wholly indefensible.

Then, sir, if I have done none of these things—if I have practiced none of the devices so clearly permissible under our rules, but on the contrary have sought to facilitate rather than to obstruct useful legislation, why am I to be arraigned before this House and the country upon these frivolous and senseless accusations? What have I done to deserve this unreasonable impeachment? Nothing, sir, absolutely nothing.

"The head and front of my offending" is, and only is, that I have demanded precisely what the Constitution itself demands, and that is, that we shall have a quorum here before we vote away the people's money and undertake the enactment of their laws. If this is wrong, the fault lies with the Constitution for requiring it, and not with me for seeking to enforce its requirement. If we have reached a point in the history of the country when we can not conduct the business of this House in the exact and orderly manner prescribed by the supreme law of the land—if Congress has outgrown the forms of the Constitution—then, sir—

Mr. BOUTELLE. Will the gentleman permit an inquiry?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I suppose the gentleman, in referring to "the supreme law of the land," alludes to the late opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States? [Laughter.]

Mr. BAILEY. No, sir; I refer to the Constitution.

Then, sir, I repeat, if Congress has outgrown the forms of the Constitution, let us stand before our constituents like men and tell them so, and ask them for its amendment. I grant you, sir, it is easier and more convenient to suspend it by "unanimous consent" than it is to amend it according to its terms; but until some gentleman can specify the provision which authorizes Congress to suspend the Constitution I shall persist in my present determination.

Mr. Speaker, among all the wise and well-considered provisions of the Constitution there are none more excellent than this. Our fathers recognized that they could not fix for all time to come, a certain number to constitute a quorum; because what would be safe then, would not be safe as the country should grow and the membership of Congress be increased; and therefore, with that rare wisdom which characterized all their labors they harmonized the principle of permanence with the principle of progress, and established it as a rule safe under all circumstances—flexible, and yet applying with equal security to all changes and all conditions—that a majority of the men elected to transact the people's business should be necessary to do so.

Mr. Speaker, there is not a member of this House to-day who will venture to say that the people would ratify a proposition to alter this provision in the slightest particular; and I submit it to your candor and your sense of due responsibility, are you willing to do, without the consent of your constituents, that which, if they were consulted, they would not consent for you to do?

But I sometimes hear it said that as to much of the work done here the people do not care whether there is a quorum present or not. I assume no power to look into their minds and hearts and read a meaning there different from what they have written in their Constitution; and whoever declares that the people are indifferent upon this point has read the history of constitution-making in recent years to very little purpose. In examining the earlier constitutions we find that nearly all of them copied the language of our Federal instrument. But it was soon found that legislators dislike to be disagreeable, preferring even to disregard the Constitution rather than to offend their friends, and so it happened that many laws were put upon the statute books that did not represent the assent of a quorum.

Were the people satisfied with this? I do not ask you to take my opinion; but let their later constitution make the answer. In the last forty years—or to speak more exactly, since 1850—there have been thirty-five State constitutions adopted in this Union. Out of the thirty-five twenty-eight require not only that a quorum shall be present, but upon the final passage of every bill the yeas and nays shall be taken and entered upon the journal. And most of them require, not only that a majority of a quorum, but that a majority of all the members elected shall vote for every bill before it can become a law.

Of the remaining seven, the State of Virginia, the State of Tennessee, the State of Georgia, and the State of North Carolina, require that upon every bill which releases a charge or makes an appropriation, the yeas and nays shall be taken. Of the remaining three, West Virginia requires that upon a bill originating in one House, amended in the other, and coming back for final passage, the yeas and nays shall be taken. The remaining two are South Carolina and Texas. Texas fixes her quorum at two-thirds and provides for the yeas and nays on the demand of any three men, and South Carolina has a constitution framed in reconstruction times.

Thus, Mr. Speaker, we see that in over forty years there has not been a State constitution adopted, except the reconstruction constitution of South Carolina, which has not embodied a further restriction upon the lawmaking power.

I have before me two volumes embracing all the constitutions adopted up to 1876. Since then the States of Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, Kentucky, North and South Dakota, Wyoming, Idaho, Montana, and Washington have adopted constitutions; and in every single one of them the requirement is incorporated that the yeas and nays shall be taken on the final passage of every bill.

Turning, sir, to these volumes and beginning with the first State, we find that the constitution of the State of Alabama requires that—

Every bill shall be read on three different days in each house, and no bill shall become a law unless, upon its final passage, it be read at length, and the vote be taken by the yeas and nays, the names of the members voting for or against the same be entered upon the journals, and a majority of each house be recorded thereon as voting in its favor, etc.

The States of Arkansas, Colorado, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maryland, all require the same thing. The State of Michigan—God save the mark—requires the same thing. Yes, sir; the State of Michigan, whose distinguished Representative thought it his duty to rebuke me for requiring a quorum.

Mr. CHIPMAN. Mr. Speaker, I would say to the gentleman from Texas that I am not responsible for what appears in the Post. I do not edit that paper. Do not drag me in.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I am glad to acquit the gentleman from Michigan—

Mr. CHIPMAN (interrupting). I do not go to the press to make my comments on my brother Representatives.

Mr. BAILEY. I am very willing to acquit the gentleman; but it is a fact that the State of Michigan requires that the yeas and nays shall be taken on every vote, and a majority of all the men elected shall be required to pass a law. The State of New York requires the same thing; and, furthermore, it requires that as to appropriations of the public money and the release of charges, three-fifths of the members shall be necessary to constitute a quorum, and the yeas and nays must be taken. The State of New Jersey, one of whose Representatives here rises so demurely and demands a division as a sort of punishment against me, requires the same thing.

I repeat, sir, that every constitution, with the single exception of the reconstruction constitution of South Carolina, adopted in more than forty years past, has attempted to further limit the action of Legislatures. In order that there shall be no mistake in regard to this question, I shall insert in the RECORD the very language of these various State constitutions.

The constitution of Alabama provides that—

No bill shall become a law unless on its final passage it be read at length and the vote be taken by yeas and nays, the names of the members voting for and against the same be entered on the journals and a majority of each house be recorded thereon as voting in its favor, except as otherwise provided in this constitution. The constitution of Maryland provides that—

No bill shall become a law unless it be passed in each house by a majority of the whole number of the members elected, and on its final passage the yeas and nays be recorded; nor shall any resolution requiring the action of both houses be passed except in the same manner. (Article 3, section 23.)

The constitution of Michigan provides that—

Every bill and joint resolution shall be read three times in each house before the final passage thereof. No bill or joint resolution shall become a law without the concurrence of a majority of all the members elected to each

No bill shall be passed unless by the assent of a majority of all the members elected to each branch of the Legislature, and the question upon the final passage shall be taken immediately upon its last reading, and the yeas and nays entered on the journal. (Article 3, section 15.)

And also that—

On the final passage in either house of the Legislature, of any act which imposes, continues, or revives a tax, or creates a debt or charge, or makes, continues, or revives any appropriation of public or trust money or property, or releases, discharges, or commutes any claim or demand of the State, the question shall be taken by yeas and nays, which shall be duly entered upon the journals, and three-fifths of all the members elected to either house shall, in all such cases, be necessary to constitute a quorum therein. (Article 2, section 21, amendment.)

The constitution of Ohio provides that—

(Article 2, section 14.)

The constitution of Tennessee provides that—

Every bill shall be read once on three different days, and be passed each time in the house where it originated before transmission to the other. No bill shall become a law until it shall have been read and passed on three different days in each house, and shall have received on its final passage in each house the assent of a majority of all the members to which that house shall be entitled under this constitution, and shall have been signed by the respective speakers in open session, the fact of such signing to be noted on the journal; and shall have received the approval of the governor, or shall have been otherwise passed under the provisions of this constitution. (Article 2, section 18.)

Now, Mr. Speaker, what is the conclusion to be deduced from all of this? The object of these requirements must be obvious to every intelligent man. Beyond all possibility of a doubt the purpose is to compel, not only the attendance, but the participation of a quorum in all matters of legislation.

Then, sir, one of two things is necessarily true, either that the States are unwise in their tendency to impose additional limitations upon their lawmakers, or we are culpable in our tendency to ignore all limitations.

I do not believe it is right that when my distinguished friend from Minnesota votes for his next-door neighbor to become a representative in the State Legislature, whose sessions are held under the very eyes of the people, whose every act must be known throughout the State before it can become a law, and whose appropriations will not exceed $5,000,000 annually—I say I do not believe it is right that he shall send that representative to the State Legislature hedged about with provisions more restrictive than those which bind the Representative whom he sends to Congress, whose sessions are held 2,000 miles from home, and whose appropriations reach the almost fabulous sum of $500,000,000.

The criticisms that have been made against me imply one of two things; either the sovereign States of this Union were wrong in their constitutional enactments or else, according to my critics, we must concede the absurd doctrine that the further a Representative is removed from his people and the more money he spends, the more loosely he is justified in proceeding.

The tendency in the States is to increase the lawmaker's responsibility, while the tendency here is to destroy all responsibility. These tendencies are opposite and irreconcilable, and without reference to the merits of either, the conclusion is irresistible that whenever the people in recent years have had opportunity to speak on the subject they have unequivocally and almost invariably demanded that a majority of the men whom they elect to transact their business shall be necessary to do so.

But, sir, they tell me that it is inconvenient to enforce the rule at all times. That, Mr. Speaker, does not satisfy me. It implies a condition that is discreditable to this House, because it is equivalent to a confession that one-half of us are usually absent. If a majority of the members were always here, the point would never be made; if they failed to attend, only on rare occasions it could seldom be made, and, at the worst, it could only result in an occasional inconvenience.

Absenteeism has become a habit with members simply because the House has encouraged it, and nothing, it seems to me, could be so well calculated to correct this great evil as for every member to know that this body could and would come to no resolution or vote in the absence of its majority. The taxpayers of this land are paying three hundred and thirty-two men to transact their business, and I am not willing to believe that one-half of that number will neglect the necessary and faithful performance of the service. The men who take the honors and emoluments of public office ought to meet and to discharge its obligations, and surely our first and highest duty is attendance upon the sessions of this House. We seldom sit longer than five hours, and we ought to remain here during that time.

But, sir, if this were not true—if I did not regard it as the duty of a Representative to attend here—there is still another and fatal objection to this method of proceeding without a quorum. This argument of convenience was made to the convention which framed the very Constitution under whose authority we are gathered here. It was pressed by some of the most illustrious men in that assembly and was rejected there. It was argued that the country was so widely extended that members from the remoter parts might not attend the early days of the session, or that they might be detained here until, worn out, they would go to their homes. It was even urged that a few men who might be hostile to a given measure would break a quorum by withdrawing from the Hall. They called it "seceding" in that day.

Every man admitted that these were serious inconveniences, and that they might become dangers; but, said Mr. Ellsworth, "It will be a pleasing ground of confidence for the people to know that no law and no burden can be imposed upon them by a few men," and so thought the convention.

Therefore when they came to take the vote upon a substitute for the present rule, which declares that a majority shall constitute a quorum, nine States voted against it and only two States voted in its favor—the State of Massachusetts and the State of Delaware alone voting in favor of the substitute. Then, when on motion of Mr. Madison, seconded by Mr. Randolph, the section was amended by clothing less than a quorum with authority to compel the attendance of absentees, this provision was adopted without a dissenting voice.

It appears to me, Mr. Speaker, that while the matter of convenience is a proper one for this House to consider in framing such rules as it has the power to make, yet in a case like this, where the Constitution itself has fixed a limitation upon the House, the question is, not what is most convenient, but what is precisely lawful.

But I am told that it has not been customary to make the point. If that were true, it is merely an evasion and not an answer. But it is not true. The Journals of this House bear ample witness that it has been made thousands and thousands of times. But conceding all that can be claimed for a custom, you must still remember that while custom may make a law it can not unmake a Constitution.

Mr. Speaker, I may be mistaken in my course; but, sir, I am striving honestly to fulfill the lessons which I learned at the feet of Democratic teachers, who taught me to believe that the main condition upon which depends not only the happiness of these people, but the perpetuity of their institutions, is an absolute obedience to every line and every letter of the Constitution. [Applause.] My vision, sir, may be too narrow to comprehend that larger view which it is so much the fashion now to extol, or it may be that I have given too many days and nights to the contemplation of those theories of government which modern politicians find it easier to condemn than they do to learn; but at all events, I have not attained, and I do not aspire to that exalted height that raises me above the Constitution of my country.

I still delight to claim a fellowship with those sturdy and old-fashioned men who cherish an almost superstitious reverence for that sacred instrument. In spite of its repeated and shameful violations, rent and torn as it is until it is almost a thing of shreds and patches, I bow before its altar with idolatry, and still venerate it as the ark of a new covenant pledging a favored people the inestimable blessings of liberty.

Mr. Speaker, it is a curious spectacle to me, and certainly it is not a grateful commentary on our times, that an American Representative must rise in his place on this floor and defend himself for having defended the Constitution.

But, sir, I cheerfully bear all the opprobrium which attaches to my action, though I am not mad enough to dream that single handed and alone I can reform an abuse which is the growth of many years. I know too well that the chasm which yawns in this forum demands an infinitely richer sacrifice than I am before it will close over its victim's lifeless form; but at least I shall enjoy the satisfaction of knowing that I have done my duty; and sustained by this consciousness, I can appeal from the passionate and angry protests which assail me here to the sober judgment of my own constituents, confident of their approval, and with that for my shield, the shafts of malice and revenge fall spent and harmless at my feet. [Applause.]

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded. On yesterday evening the previous question was ordered on several bills coming over from the Committee of the Whole. The Clerk will report the first bill.

MERIDY SMITH.

The Clerk read as follows:

The bill (H. R. 5722) increasing the pension of Meridy Smith.

Mr. ENOCHS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ENOCHS. Would an amendment to that bill be in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair finds that the previous question was ordered on the pending amendment, and upon the engrossment and third reading of the bill, and also by unanimous consent on the final passage of this bill.

Mr. ENOCHS. Can I not get unanimous consent for an amendment to that bill? I ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment to the bill.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. What amount does the gentleman propose?

Mr. ENOCHS. There are but eight of these old Revolutionary widows in this country. This lady is 96 years of age, and she requires, as everyone well knows, the most tender care. She is the widow of a soldier who gave us the Republic. I want to see her put in such a condition that she will be absolutely comfortable the balance of her life. I want to amend by striking out "thirty" and inserting "$100."

Mr. WILSON of Missouri. I object.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

MRS. JENNIE Y. WADE.

The next bill coming over from the Committee of the Whole was the bill (H. R. 2073) granting a pension to Mrs. Jennie Y. Wade.

Mr. KILGORE. That is one of the bills in which the previous question was ordered last night?

The SPEAKER. The previous question was ordered up to the final passage of the bill.

Mr. KILGORE. All right, then.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

BETSEY WORTHINGTON.

The next business coming over from the Committee of the Whole was the bill (H. R. 5200) for the relief of Betsey Worthington.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out the words "twenty-five" and insert in lieu thereof the word "thirty."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

JONATHAN RAMEY.

The next business coming over from the Committee of the Whole was the bill (H. R. 3587) for the relief of Jonathan Ramey, Mexican war veteran.

The amendments were read, as follows:

In line 6, after the words "granted a pension of," strike out the word "ten" and insert the word "twenty."

In line 7, after the words "from the date of," strike out the words "said battle, February 23, 1847, and that he be enrolled on the pension list from said date, and have his pension audited and allowed from said date, and the arrearages paid to him at once," and insert the following: "the passage of this act, the same to be in lieu of the pension now paid him."

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM F. C. NINDEMANN.

The next business coming over from the Committee of the Whole was the bill (H. R. 7281) granting pension to William F. C. Nindemann, late of the Jeannette expedition to the Arctic Ocean.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, a motion to reconsider the several votes by which the bills have been passed, and to lay that motion on the table in each of these cases, will be entered. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, Mr. CADMUS obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House papers in the case of Henry Cook, Forty-seventh Congress, there being no adverse report thereon.

campment in September, 1892, Mr. LAPHAM, Mr. OUTHWAITE, and Mr. HULL.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This completes the call of committees for reports. The regular order is the call of committees for the consideration of bills under the rule, and the call rests with the Committee on Military Affairs. The Clerk will report the pending bill.

MILITARY POST, VERMONT.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1233) to establish a military post on the line of the railway between Burlington and Highgate, Vt.

The SPEAKER. This bill is in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Speaker, the House had not yet resolved itself into Committee of the Whole. I was about to make that motion when the morning hour expired, and I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of this bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. DOCKERY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to accept, free of cost to the United States, a donation of a tract of not less than 300 acres of land on the line of railway between Burlington and Highgate, in the State of Vermont, and to construct thereon, out of any appropriation available for that purpose, the necessary buildings, with the appurtenances, for a military post; and he is authorized to proceed in acquiring land as provided for the enlargement of the military post at Plattsburg, N. Y., by act approved March 3, 1891: Provided, That in his judgment the said tract of land is found to be in all respects adequate and suitable for the purpose, and that the title shall have been declared valid by the Attorney-General of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE] is recognized for fifty-five minutes, five minutes having been occupied by him when the bill was before the committee on a former occasion.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that any general debate is desired upon this bill, and unless it is I would prefer, in order to save time, that it should be dispensed with. I now ask unanimous consent that general debate be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Yes, sir; I object. We want to know what there is in this bill.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. There will be an opportunity for the gentleman to learn what is in this bill without having general debate. I will make a statement as to the contents of the bill.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Well, after you explain the bill perhaps I will withdraw the objection.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Very well. The bill provides, in the first instance, for accepting, free of cost to the Government of the United States, the donation of a tract of land of not less than 300 acres. It is to be on the line of railroad between Burlington and Highgate, in the State of Vermont. This point has been selected by the War Department as a suitable and proper point because of its geographical position and its railway position; it being so situated that it is a strategic point to guard all of New England. It is near the great channel of commerce between Canada and the United States. It is upon the line which for two hundred years has been the line of advance of any invasion that has come from the north in that part of the country. It is so situated as to command the whole situation, guarding as an outpost the New England portion of the country. It is near railroad communications by means of which our troops could be massed from the southward. It is near the Canadian border and within about 100 miles of the Canadian Pacific.

That road, as I understand, runs along the north side of the Ottawa, and, below Montreal, on the north side of the St. Lawrence, and in the neighborhood of that city, is within about 100 miles of this point. If we should desire to cut the communication between the eastern part of Canada and the Great Lakes this would be a favorable point from which to operate. There is a water way upon this side of the St. Lawrence which this post would command to a certain extent.

Mr. MCCREARY. Will the gentleman state whether it is proposed to erect a fort at this point?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Not at all. It is simply proposed to establish a military post upon a plan prepared by the War Department upon the idea that there shall be a chain of posts all across the country at about the same distance from the Canadian border, beginning at this point in the East and extending through to the vicinity of the Pacific Ocean.

Mr. MCCREARY. There are already, I believe, military posts established on that frontier.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Yes, there are already posts on this line.

There is a bill before the House to establish a similar post in Montana.

Mr. MCCREARY. Who proposes to make this donation of land? Individuals, a corporation, or the State of Vermont?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I am not advised as to who proposes to make the donation, nor that anyone has made a proposal. I am simply advised by the bill itself that the post is not to be established unless a suitable tract acceptable to the War Department is donated either by citizens or by the State of Vermont. Let me say further that the War Department is pursuing a system of reduction of military posts. That is to say, it is doing away with small posts throughout the country, endeavoring to concentrate the forces, and to establish larger posts so as to make it unnecessary to have the troops scattered here and there at remote points throughout the country. The present system is more expensive than one of greater concentration.

The report states that—

The location is at an important railway center from which several lines radiate to vital strategic points in Canada, and also to all parts of the New England States and New York.

That is the reason the War Department has selected this particular locality.

There is no point on the border where a more rapid concentration of troops could be made.

If we want posts at all we want them at points where just this thing can be accomplished—a rapid concentration of the troops of the United States—

There is none where they would be more available for necessary service in case of hostility between this country and Great Britain.

The primary advantage of the location is its availability for operating against the St. Lawrence canals.

There is another provision that in case the 300 acres donated be not sufficient, the War Department may proceed to condemn other lands or to procure them in the same manner as they were procured for the enlargement of the military post at Plattsburg. That is a provision which is not at all likely to be used by the War Department. There is no proposition at this time, and no expectation of any necessity, for an increased number of acres, for a long time to come.

I have thus explained the object of the bill. I want to be frank with the House, and I want members to understand clearly that while this bill does not propose any appropriation whatever at this time—while there is no expectation on the part of the War Department or the Committee on Military Affairs that any specific appropriation will be made for this post—yet there is in the bill a provision that out of funds available for constructing necessary buildings, the War Department may apply a sufficient sum to erect such buildings as may be deemed necessary there at this time, and other additional buildings that may be required from year to year.

In this, as in all other matters, we have to trust to the discretion of the War Department. From year to year Congress appropriates a large sum in bulk to be expended at the discretion of the Secretary of War, to build posts or to erect necessary buildings at posts, and all there is in this bill, is to place this site for a post under the provisions of these general bills.

I trust now, unless some gentleman desires time to speak upon this proposition—

Mr. STOCKDALE rose.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. STOCKDALE. The time has not been limited, I believe.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. The time is necessarily limited. Unless the gentleman wants a good deal of time, I trust he will oblige me by not taking too much.

Mr. STOCKDALE. I am always glad to oblige the gentleman, but I do not care to be under any censorship as to how much time I shall use.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. The gentleman knows me quite well enough to understand that I would not undertake any censorship. But I wish to give other gentlemen an opportunity to talk if they desire; and all the time we have is fifty-five minutes.

Mr. STOCKDALE. I did not know that; I beg the gentleman's pardon. I will use very little time.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Very well; I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi as much time as he desires.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I ask for the reading of the report.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I read the chief parts of the report in the course of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The report can be read, if the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. STOCKDALE] yields for that purpose.

Mr. STOCKDALE. I do not want to yield for the reading of the report in my time. I know what is in the report.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is entitled to the floor.

Mr. STOCKDALE. In my judgment, Mr. Chairman, we are occupying in reference to this bill a most anomalous attitude.

A large number of the gentlemen in this House and in the Senate are constantly proclaiming the policy that we must cultivate close relations, both commercial and social, with Canada, with a view to ultimately annexing the province to the United States. Yet the present move seems to be to thrust military posts in their faces all along the line. Why, sir, is there any danger of a war with Canada or with the Government of which it is a province? Why do we want this enlarged post in Vermont? What movements of hostility are there on the part of the Canadian Government or the Government of which it is a province? All the differences that existed between our Government and England have been accommodated, as we understand, by the consummation of a treaty and the modus vivendi. Is it true that we are in any danger? Or is it true that the United States Government has a chip on its shoulder and is strutting before the world to see whether somebody will not knock it off?

A MEMBER. Both on land and sea.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. And that is the way to produce war.

Mr. STOCKDALE. As the gentleman remarks, that is the way to produce war. Suppose we establish so large a military post on the Canadian border, is it not true that the Government of Canada, or the Government of which it is a province, has a right under international law and practice to inquire of this Government, "What do you mean by increasing your armed force on the border?" Such inquiries are usual between all governments. We would have to make some reply. They would refer to the debates in this Congress—the statement of a man of as high standing in the country and in this House, a man of as broad views, as the gentleman from Ohio, that we need to strengthen and enlarge our military force on the Canadian border.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I did not speak of this as a present need, but only as one of the ordinary matters of national defense.

Mr. STOCKDALE. If there is no present need, then this is an adroit way to commit the House to extended appropriations. Why, sir, the other day when a provision involving three millions and a half of dollars was about to be adopted for the building of a cruiser it was stated here that it carried no appropriation at present, but the appropriation would come later, that is, we were going to build a ship without money! This bill asks for no appropriation now, but it provides for the acceptance of land, and the construction of a large military post; it contemplates that 300 acres may not be enough, and proposes that the War Department be authorized to condemn some land in order to enlarge this post.

It is said the policy of the War Department is to concentrate its forces, and for that purpose to establish these large military posts along the Canadian borders, from the eastern coast out to Dakota. There must be some reason for this policy. Is it not true that a military organization is always trying to enlarge and magnify its powers whether there is a prospective need for the use of the military arm or not? And, Mr. Chairman, if that is true this seems to be exactly in line, as I believe it to be, with that policy. The regular Army of the United States amounts to little; it would not stand against the forces of Canada, which could be brought into combat under the British Government very long. These forces could overrun the regular Army of the United States in one march.

How then do we resist invasion; on what do we rely? Upon our citizen soldiery. And therefore instead of concentrating these forces at the larger posts, the smaller posts all along the line should remain as points upon which the citizen soldiery could rally in case of need. There would be the officers to drill the men, and when the tocsin of war is sounded, if ever, a citizen soldiery will rally all along this border line, presenting an unbroken front to any opposing force, instead of being concentrated at these larger posts or at a single post, and then distributed along the line afterwards. Therefore Congress, in place of consenting to the concentration of these posts, should establish a greater number of smaller ones if there is need for them at all.

Mr. BRETZ. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. STOCKDALE. Certainly.

Mr. BRETZ. It was asserted the other day when the naval bill was under discussion that the increase in the Navy meant a corresponding increase in the military forces, and this is apparently the first step in that direction.

Mr. STOCKDALE. Certainly, it is another step in the same general direction, constantly increasing the military power and its control over the people and the expenditure of money upon a fictitious scare.

Why, Mr. Chairman, there never was anything in the Chilean matter. Nobody anticipated trouble with Chile. Nobody expected a war to grow out of our relations with that country. It was only a scare. Nobody ever intended or expected any war with Great Britain that would have killed more people than we would have saved seals, and the scare was disposed of as soon as

Mr. Blaine got over his little attack of the grip and got back to his office. But now we are told we must yield to the demands of the War Department. They have got up a new policy of concentrating all of our forces. Where? On the Canadian line. Why? Why because we may have war some day when our grandchildren are here to look after it and these posts will be of value. It is the play of the Widow Bedott over again, and that is all.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Georgia, I understand, wants to have the report read and I will yield to him.

The CHAIRMAN. For how long a time?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. As much time as he desires.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the report be read in my time.

The report (by Mr. BELKNAP) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 462) to establish a military post on the line of railway between Burlington and Highgate, Vt., have examined the same and recommend that it do pass.

It is practically identical with Senate bill No. 4833 of the Fifty-first Congress, second session, which passed the Senate, and House bill No. 3394, which was reported favorably by House Committee on Military Affairs, except that it makes no appropriation, leaving the construction of the post to be provided for when it can be, out of the general appropriation for the construction of military posts. It meets the approval of the Secretary of War and the Commanding General of the Army.

The location is at an important railway center from which several lines radiate to vital strategic points in Canada, and also to all parts of the New England States and New York. There is no point on the border where a more rapid concentration of troops could be made, and none where they would be more available for necessary service in case of hostility between this country and Great Britain. The primary advantage of the location is its availability for operating against the St. Lawrence canals.

The committee believe that the establishment of a post in this locality will be more effective in case of hostilities, and cost far less money than to build fortifications as have heretofore been proposed. The following correspondence shows the necessity for this legislation.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I do not care to have the correspondence appended to the report read.

Mr. Chairman, I hope that this bill will not pass for this reason: First, it is the policy of this Government to have our soldiers making corn until there is necessity for them in the field. It is certainly not the policy of this country to build or establish military posts. If you begin that system you will have to extend it along the entire line from Canada to California. It should not pass for the additional reason that it is a threat held in the face of the English Government. It is intended to brood war and bring it about, instead of to promote peace and establish peace.

There is another reason why it should not pass. It precipitates on the House and on Congress the expenditure of an immense amount of appropriations to establish and keep intact these posts, and that is a sufficient objection to it. This bill carries within itself an appropriation. It is well known to the Committee on Appropriations that there is always a balance, and in some instances a large balance, of money carried over under the military bill that has usually passed the House. This bill provides that that money may be used at the discretion of the Secretary of War. While it is not a special appropriation it is a general one which can cover all possible ends.

Why not pass a bill to procure and encourage volunteer companies in this country? Take this section of the country where this military post is proposed to be established, and the people are as thick as bees in a hive. The least disturbance on the Canada side would call them up from their fields and shops, thousands and hundreds of thousands of volunteers, to protect the frontier. There is no more necessity for this bill to enable this country to protect its interests or its commerce than there is for a fifth wheel to a wagon, not a bit. I hope, sir, that this House has not made up its mind to such a measure as this, or is willing to commit itself to a policy of this kind in this the day of peace; in this the day when peace reigns, and when the masses of the people want peace instead of war; in this day when the masses of the people, especially the Southern people, are demanding economy, on account of their poverty and the existing depression from one end of the country to the other.

I hope that members on this floor will consider, before we commit ourselves to this policy of building and establishing military posts, for if this bill passes there will be a hundred demands from one end of this country to the other for the establishment of other posts.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE] has the floor.

Mr. SCOTT. I would like to ask a question. If this gift or location is accepted, what is the estimate made of the cost of establishing the post afterwards?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. There is no estimate made of the cost of establishing the post afterwards. As I said in my brief remarks awhile ago, only such buildings are constructed as are necessary. Each year Congress makes an appropriation, sometimes as much as $750,000, sometimes half that amount, for the War Department to erect buildings at posts, at the discretion of the Secretary of War, and the same discretion will be applied to this as is applied to all other posts.

Mr. SCOTT. May I ask another question?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Certainly.

Mr. SCOTT. Whether the committee know what the War Department contemplates in the way of establishing posts along the border between this country and Canada?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. The War Department contemplates diminishing the number of small posts all over the country, selling those that are remote from railroads and that are not of any value or importance any more, and the establishment of a sufficient number of posts for the Army, as it is now constituted, and no more. In this instance it would not necessarily mean anything more than a small post, as an outlying one.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that after hearing the answers to the questions propounded to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, and the statement of the policy of the War Department in establishing a line of military posts along the Canadian border, it seems to me that the acceptance of this donation is virtually committing this House, and, so far as we can, the country, to the policy of extending our military preparations. I can hardly see how anyone in the present condition of affairs in this country can believe that there is any need, or that there is a possibility of need, for extending the military equipment of the country.

Certainly there never was a time when there was less prospect, even possibility, of war, or need of defending ourselves against our neighbors, than there is at present. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, we ought to destroy the barriers that exist between this country and Canada to-day. We ought to tear down the battle-lines of protection and enable this country and Canada to trade with each other, and be more friendly, rather than to anticipate that the people of these two countries are proposing to go to war. This is especially an age of peace, of prosperity, of growth, of financial development. We ought to look to the establishment of our trading facilities and the opening of our roadways, rather than to the building up of these obstructions to interchange of products and these menaces to the peace and prosperity of our country.

I feel, and I believe that throughout the country there is the feeling, that there is no need for any additional war equipment; particularly is this so as against our neighbors on the North, with whom we are on the most friendly terms. There is no need that we should build forts to fight them. This bill involves necessarily a large expense. This policy of construction of useless military posts, involving the appropriation of other sums of money to build houses and other equipments, should not be entered upon, and I hope the House will not pass this bill.

The question has not been answered here as to who is the donor of this military reservation. Not knowing who has so generously offered to give this land, whether it may be from one motive or another, it seems to me this House can do well at this time to carry out the evident policy and disposition of the country to remain in peace, rather than to take steps which look toward a preparation for war.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I want to ask the chairman of the committee one question for information purely. This bill reads in this way:

And to construct thereon out of any appropriations available for that purpose.

The United States Congress annually appropriates from $200,000 to $400,000 for this purpose. Will not his bill leave it discretionary with the Secretary of War to take that entire $400,000, if he sees fit, and appropriate it right here on this spot?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. As I said before, each year an appropriation is made for that purpose, and each year it is put in the discretion of the Secretary of War, and I never knew of a Secretary of War abusing the discretion to the extent that the gentleman intimates.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. That does not answer my question. Could he not use it all for this purpose?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. No; I do not think that would be in the discretion of the Secretary of War at all. I do not think any Secretary of War could justify any such proposition as that.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I withdraw my objection to the closing of general debate.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. The gentleman from Georgia withdraws his objection to dispensing with general debate.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio renew the request?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio, chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, asks unanimous consent that general debate on this bill be considered as closed. Is there objection?

Mr. SIMPSON. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE] has the floor.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL].

Mr. HULL. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the opposition to this bill is proceeding on a false assumption as to what is intended by the bill. As I understand, and as the Military Committee understand it, the function of the Government is to save money instead of spending it. It is regarded by the authorities that the Indian wars are largely things of the past. We have a large number of posts out through the Indian country, which are expensive to keep up, small posts away from railroads, which make it necessary to transport supplies by wagon trains, and it is a matter of constant expense to the Government to maintain the troops in these posts on the frontier.

We have adopted a plan of concentration, not for the purpose of enlarging our military power, not for the purpose of increasing the Army, but simply to take care of the troops that we have in larger posts, at a much less expense than they can now be maintained.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, there is too much noise to hear the speaker, and I want to hear him.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. HULL. We have recently, by action of this House, provided for a ten-troop post at Little Rock, which will supply troops for all that part of the country, where they can be distributed on short notice for any purpose, and preserve the peace of the country among the Southern Indian tribes. We have unanimously reported a bill here to establish a ten-troop post at Helena, Mont., and now this is to bring down the chain around the Canadian border, we establish another post, at a point where the troops can be taken care of at much less expense than it is possible for the Government to take care of them where they are.

It seems to me that the question as to who donates the land is one which need not concern the House. We have adopted a rule in these matters of establishing posts at no point where the land is not donated.

Mr. WHITE. Will my colleague allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HULL. Certainly.

Mr. WHITE. If it is the primary object in establishing these posts to take care of the troops in as cheap a way as possible, why not build these posts in a milder climate? Why go north, where there will necessarily be an additional expense in taking care of the soldiers in the winter?

Mr. HULL. The question of cheapness is not and can not be the only or main question in establishing posts. I was answering a question in my remarks as to increased expenditures. I did not say that that was the only object; but that is one object that meets the objection of the gentleman from Georgia, to my mind. In this case we take care of troops now enlisted in this new and improved encampment.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HULL. Certainly.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Does not the gentleman believe we need more pillars and fewer posts?

Mr. HULL. My impression is that the pillars of this Government are as firm as they ever were in the country; that the skeleton of an army we have is a pillar of strength to the Government, and as willing to do its duty as it ever has been in the past.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him what this donation stands for? Is it an inducement thrown in by a State or a syndicate?

Mr. HULL. It is an inducement to every point to have a post established; but I want to answer further than that, that the mere donation of land is no inducement to the United States to establish a post at any point, as no place is selected which is not of such strategic advantage as would justify the Government in establishing a post. This Government has not entered upon the idea of establishing a post wherever land might be offered to it by the State, but it will not establish a post except where the land is offered free by the State.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Will the gentleman allow me to call his attention to the language of the bill, which I will read:

That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to accept free of cost to the United States.

Why does this bill include that provision if you are correct that the Government ought not to consider the question of donation, but the question of location?

Mr. HULL. That is done on the theory that the Government would not establish the posts required at these different places if they could not furnish the land free of cost, and at Little Rock the State offered a thousand acres of land within 10 miles of Little Rock.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Then, it seems a question of kind of bargain, a profit and loss between the Government and somebody.

Mr. HULL. The gentleman is entirely mistaken.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. The city of Little Rock gave a thousand acres of land.

Mr. HULL. And Helena give 2,000 acres of land.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Now, that does not meet my question. I know that the Government selects these points for the military post independently first, and then talks about the donation of land afterwards. Here you talk about the donation first.

Mr. HULL. This bill, as all others have, gives no positive location. It establishes certain limits. The War Department has reported that it was necessary to establish this military post in Vermont, so as to make the chain of posts that we want on our border, between this country and Canada, in connection with the posts of the West, and this post is needed in the East, and for that purpose they want to establish it in the State of Vermont, leaving the exact location to the War Department. The Government has already agreed to the location, and determined that the location is one that is suitable, and I will state that the Government has one post at Detroit, another at Chicago, and another at Sault St. Marie, and this is an eastern connection in conjunction with posts in the State of New York. The Committee on Military Affairs reports unanimously in its favor.

Mr. MILLIKEN. And the committee thinks it is necessary to have a post confronting Canada, just as if we were at war.

Mr. WALKER. It will not have any tendency to destroy the commerce between the two countries.

Mr. HULL. The establishment of this post is to the advantage of the commerce between this country and Canada. The gentleman must certainly admit that we have to have these posts upon our borders, and they are not there as a menace to commerce.

Mr. STOCKDALE. But is it not a menace to Canada?

Mr. HULL. No, sir. If that is so, why does Great Britain have at Vancouver her great military fortifications, her great warships, her great depot of supplies? If that is a menace to this country we ought to require her to dismantle her forts. It seems to me that gentlemen are exceedingly sensitive upon this question of our menacing anybody by establishing a line of posts on our own territory.

This is not for the purpose of menacing anybody. This proposed post is not for the benefit of the State of Vermont; it is for the benefit of the United States of America. We have our Army; we have to feed them and to keep them, and is it not desirable to keep them in the best places, with a view to economy and efficiency, rather than to have them scattered among remote posts upon the frontier?

Mr. SNODGRASS. The gentleman speaks of Great Britain and her preparations for war. Our institutions are entirely different. They rest upon the patriotism and devotion of our people. We need no standing army.

Mr. STOCKDALE. Is it not true that the present condition of Europe results from just that system—one country establishing a post here, another country establishing a post opposite to match that, and so on?

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that you can compare this country with Europe in this respect. We have had posts on the Canadian frontier from the beginning of this Government, yet we have never had one particle of trouble resulting from the action of our Army at those posts.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Let me ask the gentleman whether we had any questions of this kind started the other day when there was a bill to establish a post at Little Rock.

Mr. HULL. No, sir, we have not; and while casting no reflections on the people advocating that bill and opposing this, it was a much more liberal measure.

Mr. SNODGRASS. I believe we have not had much trouble of late on that frontier.

Mr. HULL. And we shall have no more trouble after this post is established than we have had hitherto.

Mr. STOCKDALE. The post at Little Rock is so far in the interior that it could not be regarded as a menace to anybody.

Mr. HULL. Gentlemen seem to have an idea that if we establish these posts we are necessarily going to increase the Army. That is not so. We do not propose to increase the Army by a single man. But would you rather have your Army scattered among distant frontier posts than concentrated at points where they could be made more readily available? Would you rather have them at forts where it is expensive to maintain them and where they are isolated for six months in the year?

Mr. SIMPSON. Does not the gentleman know that there are several posts in Kansas where there are no troops, or very few, and which are capable of accommodating a great many?

Mr. HULL. Will the gentleman tell me what object there is in having troops in Kansas?

Mr. SIMPSON. The gentleman has spoken of the economy of maintaining the troops, and I think we can feed them cheaper in Kansas than in Vermont and give them a much better climate, too.

Mr. HULL. Oh, the gentleman is begging the question.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Does the fact that the Government is going to sell some of these unnecessary posts cut any figure in this debate?

Mr. HULL. As to the post at Little Rock, there was a reason for establishing that, because it is on our Indian frontier.

Mr. SIMPSON. Little Rock?

Mr. HULL. Arkansas is. There were some reasons for establishing that post, but there is no reason for a post in Kansas, because we are opening up to settlement all the Indian lands that border Kansas. Another reason why they do not need any additional military posts in Kansas is because they have so many peace men there that they are even sending some of them to Congress. [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMPSON. Let me state to the gentleman that there are more Indians along the border of Kansas than along the border of any other State in the Union.

Mr. CASTLE. Will the gentleman tell us how far it is from Burlington to Highgate? He proposes to establish this post somewhere between those two points. I would like to ask him what the distance is between them?

Mr. HULL. I am willing to leave the exact location of this post to the War Department, where it properly belongs.

Mr. CASTLE. I would like to ask the gentleman what direction Highgate is from Burlington, east, west, north, or south?

Mr. HULL. I will say to the gentleman that it does not make any difference whether it is east, west, north, or south. That is none of our business at this time. As to the location of the post we propose to leave it to the War Department to accept or to reject the land when it is offered.

Mr. CASTLE. I will say to the gentleman, if it is any satisfaction to him, that Highgate is straight north from Burlington and nearly 100 miles distant.

Mr. HULL. And I will say to the gentleman that it is no satisfaction whatever to me to find that out. [Laughter.] If the gentleman wants to start a class in geography I hope he will take some other occasion than this.

Mr. SIMPSON. What you want is your appropriation.

Mr. HULL. What I want is not an appropriation, but to see the symmetrical carrying out of the plans of the men who are competent to decide where these posts ought to be. The officers of the Army have recommended the passage of this bill. It is nothing to me. I represent a Western constituency. I represent a city which would donate land to get a post, because it would be worth that to the people there. That has no bearing whatever upon this case. This is simply a question of whether it is wise to establish posts where the men who have made a life study of the subject say they should be established, and to bring our troops in from the Indian country, where they are no longer needed, and keep them at these posts when established.

Mr. CASTLE. Is it not a fact that the city of Burlington, of which the gentleman speaks, is less than 50 miles from a point where there is already a military post, situated on the same lake on which Burlington is situated?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. There is a post at Plattsburg, across Lake Champlain, and as the gentleman seems to be familiar with the geography of that country, he can say himself whether that is within 50 miles or not.

Mr. CASTLE. It is.

Mr. SIMPSON. Is this post mentioned by the gentleman from Minnesota occupied by troops?

Mr. HULL. I think so.

Mr. SIMPSON. Could not that post accommodate what extra troops we desire to station up there?

Mr. HULL. So could the posts in Kansas; but the War Department desires this and I am willing to trust the question to the War Department rather than to my own judgment.

Mr. SIMPSON. I am sorry I can not share with the gentleman his confidence in the War Department.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER].

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, this is a business matter. The difference between our country and imperial countries is this: They put their great posts in the center of the country to hold their people in subjection; we put our posts upon our frontiers to protect our people.

Mr. STOCKDALE. To protect them against what?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. To protect them against all the other nations on earth.

Mr. STOCKDALE. Is there any danger of a war with Canada?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I do not know that there is any danger of war with Canada; but we are drawing in our posts from the Indian frontier; we must establish our posts somewhere; and the General of the Army and the Secretary of War have determined that the place named in this bill is a proper place for a post.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. What good would regular soldiers do in a general war between this country and Great Britain or Russia? Must we not in such a war depend entirely upon our volunteer soldiery?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. We are very largely dependent, in such cases, upon the volunteer soldiery; but it is the policy of the Government to maintain a small regular army as a nucleus for an enlarged army in case of war. As long as we maintain that policy and have an army we ought to let the General of the Army determine, with his careful study, what strategic points should be selected for military posts. In the history of the whole world it has been found that whenever legislative assemblies have sought to control military strategy and manage military forces, they have brought disaster and disgrace upon their country.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. I would like to direct the gentleman's attention to one point simply. What is the necessity or wisdom of establishing another military post within 50 miles of Plattsburg, where we have a military post now?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Because Plattsburg, on account of the changed condition of our country, is not so situated as to meet all the requirements. This proposed location is upon lines of communication, where troops can easily be concentrated and where more than half of the trade of Canada passes.

Mr. BUTLER. Does this measure contemplate the abandonment of the military post at Plattsburg?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. It may eventually result in that, but at present a post is needed at both points. Both localities are upon extensive lines of travel.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BRODERICK].

Mr. BRODERICK. Mr. Chairman, I am not opposed to the Army or Navy; nor do I object to proper measures for the establishment of military posts. But I am opposed to this proposition. In Kansas we have two military posts; and I represent a district in which one of them—Fort Leavenworth—is situated. At that post there are now occupied by officers and their families buildings which were erected thirty-five or forty years ago, and which are now absolutely unfit for occupancy. Yet we have failed to get an appropriation either for the repair of those buildings or the erection of new ones.

The stables are down. Some of the horses belonging to the cavalry and artillery had to be removed for want of stable accommodation. We have failed to get an appropriation for rebuilding the stables. Now, it seems to me that before we enter upon a policy of appropriating money for the establishment of new military posts, which appear to be unnecessary and are unnecessary at this time, we should make proper provision for maintaining creditably those posts that we have already established. I hope this bill will not pass.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. As chairman of the committee that favorably reported this bill I have been interested in this debate, and especially in the local turn that it has taken. Gentlemen seem to be of the opinion that there are some parts of this country in which military posts should not be established. What may prompt them, what may have stirred their hearts or moved their minds to oppose its passage upon such grounds, I do not care to conjecture. I have only to say as to the locality of this post that it is no farther north (if that is a true objection to a work of this kind) than several of the most important posts that now exist. The climate is no more rigorous at this point than at other points of the country where posts exist.

But I can not conceive that in a country like ours, extending from an almost tropical region in the south to an almost frigid region in the north, we should consider the question of climate. The people of the extreme North are as much entitled to protection and as much entitled to have located in their midst that which may insure their protection as the people of the West or the people of the South.

This location was made not by any political party. The selection of this site was made not through any political influence. It was made by the General of the Army, who is in political sympathy with the majority of the members of this House and always has been. His reasons for selecting this region are set forth in his letters attached to the report. They furnish the committee the reasons for their favorable action upon the bill.

The report is a unanimous one. Therefore upon this judgment, not upon political bias, the committee have acted in reporting this bill. It has the concurrent sanction not only of the General of the Army, but of two Secretaries of War. Repeated recommendations from the General of the Army have been made in favor of this selection. The pretense that has been urged here to-day in opposition to the bill that it is a wasteful extravagance to reduce the number of posts that are being or have already been abandoned because they are useless and establish others is absurd in view of the fact that these useless posts will be sold and the money put into the Treasury. That argument will not bear a fair analysis. No question of true economy arises.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Certainly.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Do I understand that this bill provides for selling the smaller posts?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I stated that the War Department itself had provided for the reduction of the number of posts, the smaller posts being given up. I said that several of these smaller posts were to be sold and the proceeds given into the hands of the Government. I said that in the course of my remarks in the beginning of the debate on the bill. I said it was distinctly no increase at all, but simply a change of location; that other posts were to be abandoned, because, in a military sense, a few of them are found unnecessary to be retained any longer at their present locations. Mr. Chairman, to whom shall we trust for judgment as to whether a post is a military necessity at any point if not to the General of the Army, whose duty it is to consider such matters in all their various military relations?

Mr. SIMPSON. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Does not the gentleman know that it is only 26 miles from Plattsburg, where there is already a post established, to Burlington, the proposed site of this new one?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Burlington is not the proposed place. The proposed place is anywhere between Burlington and Highgate, which is 100 miles further north. But that does not cut any figure. Besides, with due respect, I should rather take Gen. Schofield's judgment on a military question than that of Gen. SIMPSON at any time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I move that the committee now rise.

The question having been submitted, the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I move to amend by moving that the committee rise and report the bill, with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia moves—

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I will withdraw the motion.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I demand a division on the motion that the committee rise.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 42, noes 8.

So the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DOCKERY reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union having had under consideration Senate bill No. 1233 had come to no resolution thereon.

The SPEAKER. Since but two minutes of the morning hour remain, the Chair will treat the hour as having expired.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leaves of absence were granted as follows:

PROPOSED CORRECTION OF THE RECORD.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire now to call up for consideration a privileged matter in relation to the question of expunging from the RECORD a part of the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER], and ask the Clerk to read the resolution submitted by the Committee on Printing.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House, deeming it a high duty that the courtesy and decorum required by parliamentary law and practice should characterize debate and the conduct of members at all times in their official relations, hereby expresses its disapproval of the unparliamentary language used by Hon. JOSEPH H. WALKER, a Representative from the State of Massachusetts, in that portion of his speech printed in the RECORD on the 17th instant, but which was not delivered on the floor. And considering it impracticable to separate the unparliamentary portions of said speech from such parts thereof as may be parliamentary: Therefore,

Be it further resolved, That the Public Printer is directed to exclude from the permanent CONGRESSIONAL RECORD all of that portion of his speech beginning with the words, "Hot shot for Mugwumps—Hoar and Williams shown up," etc., on page 2259 of the daily RECORD down to and including the paragraph on page 2261, which closes with the words "but the earmarks are on it," near the bottom of the first column on said page 2261.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Printing made a report and submitted the resolution which has just been read on the 20th day of March; that report was then ordered to be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and it has also been printed as a document in the usual form and can be had on application at the document room.

Mr. Speaker, on the 18th day of March the House referred to the Committee on Printing, by the adoption of a resolution, the remarks made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] in the House and printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the 17th of March.

The committee was instructed to inquire as to whether or not the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] had violated the privileges of the House in publishing these remarks in the RECORD. It is proper to say that the gentleman had delivered a speech in the House on the 15th day of March, which was withheld for revision, and that the speech was printed, together with the remarks to which exception was taken, on the 17th day of March. The entire speech covered thirty-two columns of the RECORD. Twenty-seven of those columns composed that part of the speech which the gentleman delivered on the floor. The remaining five columns were published in the RECORD under what is known as the general leave to print extended to members.

The gentleman from Massachusetts near me [Mr. WILLIAMS] excepted to a portion of the remarks which appeared in the closing part of the gentleman's speech. These remarks, it is alleged, were in violation of the privileges of the House and of the courtesy which had been extended to the gentleman from Massachusetts to print remarks. The resolution referring this matter to the committee instructed the committee, first—

To inquire whether or not the privileges of the House have been violated in the publication made—

By the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER]; second—

Whether or not any portion thereof should be expunged from the RECORD—

And third—

What, if any, other action should be taken by the House in the premises.

The Committee on Printing did not seek the jurisdiction of this question. It was referred to them by the House, not on their motion. They met and undertook conscientiously to discharge the duties imposed upon them by the House. They requested the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WILLIAMS] who had excepted to these remarks, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] who had printed them in the RECORD, to appear before the committee, with the view, if possible, of having a friendly adjustment, if there could be one, and if not, to determine what action should be taken. These gentlemen both appeared, as set forth in the report. The committee would have been pleased if there could have been an adjustment then and there which would have obviated any necessity on the part of the committee for submitting any report in the matter, further than to say that the adjustment had been made.

On the hearing these gentlemen appeared before the committee, all the members of the Committee on Printing being present. It is sufficient to say that we were unable to effect any adjustment whatever. The attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] was directly called to the paragraphs and sentences which appeared in his remarks, and an effort was made to have him consent that they should go out, the committee stating that in their opinion these remarks to which attention was called was clearly in violation of the rules of this House.

The committee in their report have set out briefly some of the rules which are intended to govern debate in this House, and which they say are necessary to be observed. We quote first from the rule of the House, clause 1 of Rule XIV, which provides that a member—

On being recognized, may address the House from any place on the floor or from the Clerk's desk, and shall confine himself to the question under debate, avoiding personalities.

In the Manual and Digest of the rules of the House, on page 130, the first session of the Fifty-first Congress, the following will be found as a part of Jefferson's Manual:

No person, in speaking, is to mention a member then present by his name, but describe him by his seat in the House, or who spoke last, or on the other side of the question; nor to digress from the matter to fall upon the person by speaking, reviling, nipping, or unmannerly words against a particular member.

These rules, Mr. Speaker, are familiar to us all, and therefore it is not necessary to take the time of the House in quoting them. The attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] was directly called by the committee to provisions in the rules, and, as I have stated, the particular language and expressions in his speech which were obnoxious to those rules were pointed out in the committee. The gentleman, instead of withdrawing any of them before the committee, said that he stood by every word and every sentence in that speech except the caption to the concluding portion of his remark, and with which you are all familiar. I refer to the caption over the portion of his speech which he printed in the RECORD and did not deliver on the floor, beginning with the words:

"HOT SHOT FOR MUGWUMPS—HOAR AND WILLIAMS SHOWN UP—WILLIAMS'S REPORT ON SILVER COINAGE RIDDLED."

The gentleman stated that he believed those words should not be in his speech, and he was willing to have them expunged. He stated that they had got into his speech by accident, which he explained when the matter was under debate, and which explanation the committee believed. The committee did not doubt the fact that they were there by accident. But reference is made in the report to the fact that they were not stricken out by the gentleman when he revised his remarks to appear in the permanent RECORD.

But, Mr. Speaker, those were not the words which were chiefly objectionable. The committee were unanimous in their conclusion, and did not desire to do any injustice to either one of these gentlemen from Massachusetts. They had not a particle of personal interest or feeling in it, and no prejudice against the gentleman; but it was a deliberate and careful examination as to whether the rules and privileges of the House had been violated. The committee unanimously concluded that they had been violated, and they set out in the report the extracts, briefly, to which they think exception can properly be taken. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER], for instance, used this language:

Mr. Chairman, never before was such a spectacle presented on the floor of this House as is presented by Mugwumps who claim to speak for the Democrats from New England. They declare, in terms that can not be misunderstood or explained away, that each one of them, excepting O'NEIL of Massachusetts, holds his seat by deception and fraud.

This language was used in his printed remarks, not in those that were uttered on the floor, but in the remarks which he inserted in his speech under the leave to print. This, I say, the committee thought to be a clear violation of the rules and privileges of the House.

Again, the gentleman in the next sentence but one uses these words:

It looks to me as though the order now before us was passed by the Committee on Rules for the sole purpose of providing the means of continuing the fraud.

He was referring to the order for the consideration of the bill for the free coinage of silver.

Again, he uses the following language as applicable to his Democratic colleagues:

The constituents of these men now know that they were thoroughly cheated and deceived, etc.

Again, referring to two of his colleagues, he says:

This fact is peculiarly conspicuous in the case of the two Massachusetts Mugwumps, who bound themselves by an oath, in order to secure their seats in this body, etc.

Then there is a longer quotation, which I will not undertake now to read. Again speaking of his colleagues he says:

The Mugwumps ask us Republicans to certify as truth what we know and they know to be a lie, etc.

And again he says:

Here it is: a plump and square admission of duplicity by this effigy of Puritan John Harvard. It says in effect: If we do not continue to cheat the people of New England and the country and put off the free-coinage bill until we can elect Dave Hill we shall not get Dave Hill into the Presidential chair, and we shall not get free-coinage of silver, and we Mugwumps shall not get back to the Fifty-third Congress.

When before the committee the gentleman stated that he meant to refer to his colleague, Mr. SHERMAN HOAR, when he used the following words, namely:

Here it is: a plump and square admission of duplicity by this effigy of Puritan John Harvard.

He said he meant those words to be applied to the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. SHERMAN HOAR.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point that the gentleman is now stating what occurred in the committee; and I state that I did not say so in the committee; and, furthermore, he has no right to bring in what was said before a committee of this House.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, I did not hear all the gentleman has just said in his ebullition of passion and temper. I repeat, however, that the gentleman said in the presence of the committee, consisting of my colleague on my right here [Mr. MCKAIG], and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BRODERICK], and also of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WILLIAMS], and his colleague [Mr. SHERMAN HOAR], that he meant to apply those words, which I will now read—

Here it is: a plump and square admission of duplicity by this effigy of Puritan John Harvard—

to his colleague, Mr. SHERMAN HOAR. That is what I said, and I stand by it here or elsewhere.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Massachusetts. That is right, too.

Mr. MCKAIG. If my colleague will allow me, I would like to state that he not only made that statement, but he supplemented it with the further statement that in speaking of him as the "effigy of Puritan John Harvard," it was intended to be a compliment, and that it was so understood to be in the State of Massachusetts.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that in this attempt to restrict the proceedings of the House to a very correct and technical rule, that it is scarcely in accordance with any rule or custom we have ever had in this kind of a procedure—for a chairman of a committee to arraign members of the House upon his statement which was made in the committee. I make the point of order that the gentleman from Tennessee is out of order in bringing an accusation against the gentleman from Massachusetts based upon his statement of what occurred in the committee.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I have simply read from the report. That is all I have done.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I insist upon my point of order, Mr. Chairman. I call the gentleman from Tennessee to order, and ask the Chair to rule that it is out of order for him to arraign a member here on the basis of his statement of what took place in the committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MCCREARY in the chair). The Chair can rule upon that question.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I call the attention of the Chair to the language in the report, which I have read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee states that he is reading from the report. It has been usual in this House to refer to anything that is contained in a report.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I beg pardon, Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER pro tempore. But the Chair desires to state that so far as he understands the precedents it has not been usual to refer to what occurs in committee.

Mr. BOUTELLE. And is not in order.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I ask the attention of the Chair for a moment. I am not stating what occurred in committee as a committee. I am stating what occurred in a hearing, a public hearing, before the Committee on Printing, at which a number of gentlemen were present, with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] himself and his clerk. The meeting was held in the committee room, and was held publicly. When the hearing was over the committee remained, in order to consider the matter themselves. Now, I am not stating what occurred in the private session of the committee, but simply what occurred at the hearing, and which has been published for weeks in the report of this committee.

Mr. BOUTELLE. The gentleman went on to supplement that, as I understand it, by submitting what occurred in the committee. We ought to be able to trust a gentleman here who rises as the Mentor of this House as to correct style that he would confine himself at least within the limits of the orderly procedure of parliamentary bodies.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, I repeat again the language of this report, which I had just cited. This report says:

When before the committee the gentleman stated that he meant the words just quoted, to wit: "Here it is; a plump and square admission of duplicity by this effigy of Puritan John Harvard," for and to be applied to his colleague, Mr. SHERMAN HOAR.

That is all I should have said on that point if the gentleman had not interrupted me.

Mr. WALKER. The question that was asked me was this: "To whom did you refer when you said the effigy of John Harvard," and I replied that it was to SHERMAN HOAR. That was all there was of it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. But, Mr. Speaker, I have quoted the language of the gentleman, which is: "Here it is; a plump and square admission of duplicity by this effigy of Puritan John Harvard," and this language the gentleman said he applied to his colleague, Mr. SHERMAN HOAR.

Again, Mr. Speaker, the committee found that the gentleman from Massachusetts had attacked the Speaker of this House in relation to the constitution of its committees, and had alleged that a Senator, whose name I will not mention, had come over here and assisted the Speaker in making up the committees of the House in order that he might pack one of its committees so as to exclude the gentleman from Massachusetts from service thereon. In that connection and in another instance the gentleman used the names of two members of the other branch of Congress. Upon that point the committee have simply quoted from Jefferson's Manual the rule taken from Hatsel, an eminent authority on parliamentary law, which says:

Neither House can exercise any authority over a member or officer of the other, but should complain to the House of which he is, and leave the punishment to them. Where the complaint is of words disrespectfully spoken by a member of another House, it is difficult to obtain punishment, because of the rules supposed necessary to be observed (as to the immediate noting down of the words) for the security of members.

Therefore it is the duty of the House, and more particularly of the Speaker, to interfere immediately, and not to permit expressions to go unnoticed which may give a ground of complaint to the other House, and introduce proceedings and mutual accusations between the two Houses, which can hardly be terminated without difficulty and disorder. (3 Hats., 51.)

The committee thought it was improper for the gentleman from Massachusetts to mention by name the members of the other branch of Congress and to make reference to them in the offensive manner in which he did refer to them. The committee found that the gentleman had characterized his colleagues from Massachusetts by an epithet fourteen or fifteen times in the remarks which were objected to. They found—and in this they were exactly in line with the precedent established by this House during the last Congress—that those remarks, and others which were clearly in violation of the rules prescribed by the House for its government, were so interwoven with the other matter in four or five columns of the gentleman's speech that the objectionable matter could not be excluded and leave the speech or that part of it intelligible.

They therefore, following the precedent established in the last House upon a report submitted by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR], a member of the Judiciary Committee, in reference to remarks of a member of the House, recommend, inasmuch as the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER], which were deemed unparliamentary and improper, could not be separated from the context which was not obnoxious to the rules, that the entire four columns be stricken out. In making that recommendation they specify and point out the portions that appear to be objectionable.

The committee have quoted also an expression used by the Speaker of the last House (whom I now see paying attention to me), in which he said that it had been the custom for members of the House when referring to other members, their colleagues, to address them by a phrase and not by name; yet the committee found the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] in numberless instances, or in a great many instances, mentioning his colleagues, not only by name, but offensively by name. The committee, therefore, could do nothing else than what it did, and I know I reflect the sentiment of each member of the committee when I say that they had not a particle of personal interest in the matter and have not now, and no personal feeling whatever towards the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The committee simply tried conscientiously to discharge the duty, which the House imposed specifically upon them, but which also rests upon every other member of this House—the duty to see that proper decorum is observed in debate. The committee went farther and said that there was more excuse for the violation of the rules of the House in letter or spirit when committed in the heat of debate than when the matter was coolly and deliberately penned and handed in for publication under "leave to print."

Now, Mr. Speaker, that is about all I desire to say in relation to this case. Unless one of my colleagues on the committee desires to be heard I am willing now to yield the floor to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER], reserving the remainder of my hour.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has thirty-five minutes remaining.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege, and wish to be recognized to speak on this question as a question of privilege. Mr. Speaker, I come before you with a heart light as air—

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I yielded to the gentleman from Massachusetts and I did not hear his remarks as to the length of time he would occupy.

Mr. WALKER. I did not say anything about the length of time.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I give notice to the gentleman that I shall insist upon the hour rule.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I come before you with a heart light as air and a conscience void of offense, touching all matters that now are, or ever have been, before this House. I think the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WILLIAMS] and the committee have wholly misapprehended the great function of this House, and the duties and responsibilities that rest upon it and upon each individual member of it.

Strong, earnest, fearless, patriotic men, contending for mastery, can not be confined within the rules of conduct applicable to peaceful and studious assemblies, when discussing measures which presage great calamities to themselves, to posterity, and, above all, to the country they love, and for which many of them have perilled their very life's blood.

In criticising the speech or the conduct of men whose words and acts belong to the public and are not of a private nature, it should be remembered that while strong words are not strong argument, yet they have their honorable use, exemplified in the greatest classic. Great plainness of speech, even to seemingly unnecessary roughness, has always characterized the debates in this House, and still more, every other national legislature the world over; and it always will, unless our children degenerate and abandon the spirit of their aggressive sires.

What is this House if not the great committee of safety for the whole country, to expose and ward off every threatened danger to the Republic; the great grand jury of the nation, to take cognizance of every hurtful thing present or prospective; the great and general court, to hear all causes, to redress every wrong affecting rich corporations or the humblest farmer, the millionaire or the beggar, him who knows the laws of the spheres or him who is too ignorant to read his mother tongue?

In this, the highest of all courts, we are called by turns to act as judges, and, presto! as opposing counsel, sifting evidence, questioning each other, as either reluctant or too willing witnesses, and, again, fiercely contending as for either the plaintiff or the defendant, and, again, as staid jurymen, to decide righteously in every cause; and finally submitting our decisions of law and of fact to our constituents, to be overruled or confirmed by the court of last resort—an unfettered ballot box. To discharge these great duties each of us comes from no mean segment of the nation, whether in numbers, in interest, or in the determination to impress the views of our people on this House, and thereby enforce the wishes of his constituents.

This is the battle ground of ideas, of men, of parties, and of individual contestants, for political mastery—there being at stake strong interests attended with more or less of roughness in word and manner, but good humored and kindly at bottom. This is a great national inquest into the country's material, intellectual, and moral condition—into the needs of the people.

Here every one of us has a right—yea, a duty to perform—and we are cravens if we fail therein to criticize, and if need be, to denounce any party, great or small, and any individual, high or low, whose practice or teachings work, or tend to work, injury to the State; and in each case each one of us is the sole judge of his own rights and duty. Each one of us is the equal on this floor of the whole body of 331 remaining members.

No one of us, nor all combined, has either a legal or a moral right to forbear to speak and act his will in exposing, opposing, and denouncing any party, any individual, any faction, any practice that he may think hurtful to the State. Not one of us holds his seat here by either the grace or the power of any human being or any body of men outside the political unit, whose suffrages created his commission. Each of us is the agent and servant first of all and above all of the country as a whole, and none of us has either a moral or a legal right to cast any vote or to do any act that would be to the general loss of the country, however much it might promote his own State or the district he may represent. He owes a like and secondary allegiance to his State, and lastly, but by no means least, to the district that is his home, and whose immediate servant he is.

So, Mr. Speaker, none of us can allow, even at the command of all, the least abridgment of his right as a member of this House to freely inquire into, to debate, to decide, to expose, and to denounce in fierce invective, if need be, any doctrine or party or individual, as I have before said, that shall appear to be in hostility to the country's weal. Much less can any of us afford, as lovers of our common country, and seeking only her highest good, to allow any liberty accorded to any one member to be denied to any other.

My constituents demand for their Representative on this floor the same rights, the same privileges, the same freedom from inquisition or from criticism of his acts or of his words as is accorded to any other member on this floor. That much they will have at any cost. In spite of the whims or the priggishness of any member, in spite of any committee of this House, and without disrespect, I may add, Mr. Speaker, in spite of you, and in spite of all the members of this House combined, this they will have.

Mr. Speaker, in all good nature, and in all due respect for your great office and for this House, as a Representative upon this floor I will accept its decision, either as to the mutilation of the RECORD or to being censured at the bar of the House, or to being expelled if necessary, and my constituents will then officially pass upon my conduct and yours; but they demand of their Representative that he use every power available to him under the Constitution of the country and under the rules of this House to enforce, in his own behalf, the actual rules of the House upon the House as well as upon every member of it individually.

Mr. Speaker, I repeat that after the House decides upon this matter, my constituents, by their Representative, whoever he may be, will take good care, in so far as he has the power, to insist upon the application to this body, as a whole, and all the members of it alike, the rules of the House, as defined and exemplified in its decision of the question now pending.

Of the report of the committee and of the accompanying resolutions personal to myself I shall not now speak further than to say that I do not believe that the whole history of Congress furnishes another example of such utter disregard of the spirit of the rules of the House, as they are interpreted, by the universal customs of the House. My indignation is increased by each reading of it. Either the whole course of debate under the rules on the political questions that divide the country has been disorderly, or the report, written by the chairman of the committee, sets up a special standard for the regulation of my conduct.

It will not do to say: "No one objected to certain words, used by others, or they too would have been expunged." The case is made up. It is too late for that reply. I feel that the injustice this report does me ought not to be excused or overlooked. It is said: "A good judge magnifies his office." Were that the only requisite, the chairman of the committee ought to be appointed judge at once. He rings the charges as many times as his ingenuity can devise on each item of the complaint made by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WILLIAMS], magnifying it to the utmost, and practically presenting twelve or more counts in the indictment. Of the action of the other two members of the committee who assisted at the intended obsequies of my speech of March 16, the truth in which so stung the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WILLIAMS], I have only this to say: Being new members and fresh, very "fresh" indeed in their legislative duties [laughter].

Mr. WILLIAMS of Massachusetts. I rise to a point of order. The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MCCREARY). The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Massachusetts. My point of order is that references are made here to members of the committee in an insulting manner. I believe I understood the gentleman to allude to two members of the Committee on Printing as "fresh." I think the lines had better be drawn in a discussion of this kind, and I therefore make the point of order that the language of the gentleman is unparliamentary.

Mr. REED. The point of order does not seem to be well taken as a matter of fact.

Mr. MCKAIG. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WILLIAMS] will not insist upon the point of order, but will let the distinguished member from his State proceed with whatever he chooses to say in reference to the new members of this House, but I hope the opportunity will be given to at least one of the new members to reply.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Massachusetts. As the gentleman representing the committee does not object to this discussion proceeding, I will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. WALKER (resuming). I have only this to say: Being new members and fresh, very "fresh" indeed, in their legislative duties, and as to the rules of the House, and still fresher in experience of the practice of the House, under the rules—

Mr. CAMINETTI. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CAMINETTI. The gentleman is not proceeding in a parliamentary way.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. What is the objection?

Mr. CAMINETTI. My objection applies to the language upon which a point of order has already been made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WILLIAMS]. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] goes on and repeats it immediately after his colleague has sat down.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will have read the rule applicable to this matter—paragraph 4, Rule XIV.

The Clerk read as follows:

4. If any member, in speaking or otherwise, transgress the rules of the House, the Speaker shall, or any member may, call him to order; in which case he shall immediately sit down, unless permitted, on motion of another member, to explain, and the House shall, if appealed to, decide on the case, without debate; if the decision is in favor of the member called to order, he shall be at liberty to proceed, but not otherwise; and, if the case require it, he shall be liable to censure or such punishment as the House may deem proper.

Mr. SNODGRASS. I ask the gentleman from California [Mr. CAMINETTI] to withdraw his point of order and allow the gentleman from Massachusetts to proceed.

Mr. CAMINETTI. No; I think we ought to be employing our time in something more useful than listening to an unparliamentary speech of this kind.

Mr. BOUTELLE. A reference to Webster's Dictionary might perhaps elucidate this situation somewhat.

Mr. BUTLER. I suggest that there is no evidence so good as that of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] in regard to the subject of "freshness."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The only question now is whether the House will permit the gentleman from Massachusetts to proceed. [Cries of "Go on!"]

Mr. CAMINETTI. As it appears to be the wish of the House to allow the gentleman to go on, I withdraw the point.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California withdraws the point of order, and the gentleman from Massachusetts will proceed.

Mr. WALKER. Being new members, and fresh, very "fresh," indeed, in their legislative duties and as to the rules of the House, and still fresher in the experience of the practice of the House under the rules, which alone interpret their practical and true meaning, it would be wrong to add anything more as to their signing the report excepting this, namely, that the only Republican on the committee was not present at the hearing excepting for a few moments at its close.

Mr. MCKAIG. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. WALKER. No, sir; I can not.

The committee of three knows that I intended to cast no reflection upon the personal or private character of any man in the speech in question and in fact did not. My criticism was not personal, but wholly political, directed to the methods of the "Mugwump" party, and to the conduct of the Mugwumps as Mugwumps. If there is a body of men who seem to act upon the maxim that "all is fair in politics," and who thank God daily that "they are not as other men are," it is the Mugwumps; and if I so see them I have a right—nay, it is a duty—to expose them on this floor. They are no more sacred in their sayings and doings than Republicans, Democrats, Alliance men, anarchists, nihilists, socialists, Henry Georgeites, or the old Hartford conventionists.

Not a word, not a hint, of personal dishonor was cast upon either of the honorable gentlemen from Massachusetts [Mr. WILLIAMS and Mr. HOAR]. Every word of mine was directed to their party and to their political action, exclusively. Their doings in this House and their sayings to correspondents of newspapers are proper objects of criticism, and not only justified but more than justified my words.

What a spectacle is here presented! The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON], in considering the matter referred to his committee, takes no cognizance of what other men on this floor freely say and do under the rules, which are as much a part of them as the letter of the rules, but shuts himself up in a halo of virtue—in aesthetic dreamland—and with the "letter of the law" and my words, separated from every circumstance attending their use, he writes his report on an ideal situation and practice, alleged to have been discovered by the "letter of the law."

The sensitive nature of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WILLIAMS], stung to frenzy by the truths told in my speech, impelled him to come on this floor, but not to make an answer, for he can make none. He therefore denounced my words and me personally, in a speech rarely equaled in bitterness and in objectionable phrases, ending with the most impotent of all conclusions, viz, a motion to strike my speech from the RECORD; and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] seemed at once to be "unanimously of the same mind." Has any gentleman moved to strike the words of my colleague from the RECORD? I certainly have not, and I would not for a moment compromise my good sense by thus sitting in judgment on any word of any member not offensive to private character, or words or acts of his as a private citizen.

Nor do I ever plead the "baby act." Let the words of my colleague meet him in the RECORD beside those of mine. I relegate him and his words to his constituents, as the proper tribunal to pass upon all words relating to personal, party, or political action.

Nothing so "riles" the nature of nine-tenths of the Mugwumps of Massachusetts as to see men whose youth and early manhood were spent at the bench, or at the loom, or at the anvil, with stout hearts, forcing their way up to places of high honor by dint of honest toil of hand and of brain. [Applause on the Republican side.] To Mugwumps all such places appear to be "soiled" by the presence of such men.

Our sessions here had hardly begun when the junior representative of the Mugwumps attacked his colleague, the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MORSE], much as my rights on this floor are assaulted by the senior representative, being moved by the same spirit. Their conduct in this House towards genuine Democrats, towards Republicans, towards Farmers' Alliance men, and towards individual members generally reminds me of another incident, and the reply of one of England's greatest statesmen, whose early poverty and toil were held as a blot on his escutcheon in the eyes of his lordly colleagues, who, having been twitted in the House of Lords with being in a lowly place when a boy, replied, "Yes! I was a drummer boy; did I not drum well? If you had been a drummer boy you would be a drummer still." [Applause.]

I am charged with the very grievous offense of "applying the title 'Mugwumps' to my Mugwump colleagues no less than fourteen times" in a speech five and a half columns long. I plead guilty to the use of that significant word.

Being thus charged, and confessing my offense, it is proposed to strike out four and a half columns, or nine-elevenths of the speech from the RECORD, for that reason, among others. This gives me the right in my defense to state what Mugwumps are, who they are, and how freely the name is in common use in order to justify my use of the word in this House.

I say it respectfully, Mr. Speaker, that to the action of this House I am comparatively indifferent. It is not in the power of this House either to help or to hurt any man. The country will judge. It has already judged this case.

The respect one man has for another is involuntary. It is not within the control of the will, and much less is it decided by a ballot. This House itself is now on trial before the country—not I. The verdict in my case, so far as such a small matter was noticed, was immediately rendered. I am only seeking to save the honor of this House in its premeditated action. [Derisive laughter on the Democratic side.] It needs to be saved. You want some solvent to save it.

Again, the injustice of your committee is made peculiarly manifest when they say:

But these sentences and unparliamentary phrases are so interwoven with the text that the committee do not believe that they can be expunged and leave any remainder of that portion of his remarks where they appear that would be intelligible.

This statement concerning my speech finds no warrant in the text. It is not only wholly unwarranted, but wholly unjust to me. That which is proposed to be stricken out covers 37½ inches in column length. All that any man would criticize for "bad taste" even, considering the character of the party of the Mugwump, is in three compact paragraphs, easily taken out with no damage to its rhetoric or to the argument. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] One part is one-fourth of an inch in length, one is 1½ inches long, and one 1½ lines—less than one-twelfth of the matter the committee asks this House, on the motion of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr.

WILLIAMS], to expunge. Before I close I shall ask the Clerk to read it, with the parts indicated, that the House may judge for itself, in the light of the universal practice of members when addressing the House on political questions, as shown by the examples I shall submit.

Before citing precedents for my words I wish to remind members that the provocation under which words are spoken is a strong element in determining their propriety, under the rules. I do not speak under the ordinary rules of the House. I speak in justification of my words, before my peers; and I am, at least, entitled to all the liberty, as to time and circumstance, in this august assembly in presenting my case that is accorded to one in a petty court.

I know I shall be treated with the same courtesy by the honorable gentleman who now occupies the Speaker's chair [Mr. CRISP], involving as it does in my person the rights of every member of the House, that was accorded by Speaker REED to the honorable gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] when the honorable gentleman occupied hours and days in first offering amendments to appropriation bills, only to be withdrawn, and then sending up to the Clerk's desk to be read scores of newspaper clippings describing acts of violence perpetrated on colored men all over the Northern States, and charging that they showed the kind of treatment colored men usually received from Republicans—when he ought to have known, as every man at the North does know, that every one of such outrages was committed by Democratic heelers. His words in introducing this business, and the reply of the Chairman [Mr. BURROWS], clearly and truly define our rules in their generous liberality, as interpreted by the practice of this House under them. They were as follows:

MR. RICHARDSON. It would be something new in my experience if a member, when the House is in Committee of the Whole, is to be limited strictly and absolutely to the discussion of the pending bill.

THE CHAIRMAN. The Chair stated to the gentleman that when the House is in Committee of the Whole, in general debate, a very wide range is allowed, but the rule provides that, when the committee is proceeding under the five-minute rule, five minutes shall be allowed to any gentleman making any amendment to explain it; and the Chair only called the attention of the gentleman to the rule.

And the honorable gentleman [Mr. RICHARDSON] continued reading the newspaper negro clippings, on January 17, 1891, page 1322.

The District of Columbia bill being before the House, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] filled two and one-fourth pages of the RECORD with these extracts from newspapers concerning outrages on negroes.

Again, on January 20, while the same bill was under discussion, he again put in the RECORD one-half page more, it being read from the Clerk's desk.

On January 22 and 24, while the Navy appropriation bill was being considered, he put in the RECORD one-half page more.

On January 29, considerably more of the same matter was added by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON], and so on, ad nauseam. The honorable gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] thus used up hours and hours of the time of the House with this kind of matter. It was then deliberately and not hastily decided, as shown by the RECORD, that Mr. RICHARDSON had a right to do this thing under the rules of the House, which were then and are now the same as for years.

The honorable gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] then decided in his own case, as he did on Thursday, April 14 last, and as every member of the House has decided in his own case, that the rules of the House, notwithstanding the obvious and technical meaning may be contradicted; thereby, are in fact whatever (to use his exact language) is habitually and without objection done under them.

MR. RICHARDSON. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this is not a matter that should go to the Committee on Printing. This is a matter that affects the rules of the House; and the question is whether the rules have been complied with or not by members in publishing speeches which they have not uttered on the floor. The rules of the House give members that right. Now, the question is whether or no the spirit of that rule has been violated. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I insist that, if there is to be any reference of this question, certainly it must be to the Committee on Rules.

THE SPEAKER. Will the gentleman cite any rule of the House which applies to it?

MR. RICHARDSON. There is no written rule on the subject. It is done under general leave of the House; and I submit that, while it is not in the rule in words, it has been done under a custom of this House from time immemorial; and being the custom of long standing the Chair will understand that it practically amounts to a rule, and has all the force and effect of a written rule.—Congressional Record, April 15, 1892, page 3590.

Thus it appears that whatever has been done "from time immemorial," under a rule of the same ancient date, as much establishes a rule of the House, by construction and precedent, as a new wording of the rule conforming it to the practice would do, and just as surely as though the precedent had grown up without any mention of the matter in any rule. I have a right to this liberal and obvious equity of construction of the rules in my behalf, and my right as a member of this House will be violated if such construction is not given the rules in this case.

When the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WILLIAMS] declares that I committed a great offense by "editing my speeches in the RECORD," he simply shows that he is very "fresh" for a man five years, lacking two months, past middle life. Heretofore new members of excessive modesty have "tarried in Jericho until their beards had grown" before assuming to "boss" this House, or individual members of it of longer service than themselves. I have only followed custom. Nine speeches in ten that are revised are "edited" in the RECORD precisely as mine was; and all of them would be if members did their duty. In my thirty-two columns there were only three headlines. I owe an apology to the House that I did not carefully indicate in headlines all the subject treated, as is nearly the universal custom, since that date and before. Look at the following examples:

	Number of headlines.
Mr. DOCKERY of Missouri	5
Mr. BRYAN of Nebraska	30
Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois	14
Mr. RAYNER of Maryland	13
Mr. WARNER of New York	14
Mr. O'DONNELL of Michigan	22
Mr. POST of Illinois	19
Mr. BELTZHOVER of Pennsylvania	10
Mr. SWEET of Idaho	20
Mr. BROSIUS of Pennsylvania	16
Mr. BARTINE of Nevada	29
Mr. HARTER of Ohio	22
Mr. CROSBY of Massachusetts	6
Mr. BROSIUS (again)	33
Mr. NORTON of Missouri	3
and so on with all of us.

The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WILLIAMS] would make it appear that I had done an exceptionally bad thing (when the custom is universal so to do) in "extending remarks in the RECORD." In a set debate, and by leading members quite as much as by others, on an important question, where time is limited, covering three to six days, there will usually be ten to twenty hours in which fifty to one hundred or more members wish to speak, giving from six to twelve or twenty-four minutes average to a member. A few speak ten to thirty minutes; from two to four have unlimited time. Hence remarks must be extended in the RECORD or rights infringed. Three-fourths of the constituents of two-thirds of the members learn nothing on political questions excepting from the speeches of their member of Congress, which he can frank to them if printed in the RECORD.

Again, nine-tenths of the public speakers of both parties get their education for the stump from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Not only this, but it is for the interest of the country that men should be continued in Congress more than one term. Only a Mugwump can know all that is to be known the first day. Those at home desiring his place are always sowing tares while the member is away. It is in the public interest that he should be able to speak to them through the RECORD and the mails as freely as possible. Notwithstanding from one-third to two-thirds of the matter printed in a set debate is not literally spoken on the floor, many times as much care is taken by members to arrive at the truth and make accurate statements, and therefore many times as much good is done, as there would be without either a RECORD or a leave to print in the RECORD.

I had the speech now in question ready and tried to get the floor to use it for ten days. Not cowardice, as is charged, but lack of opportunity, is why the Mugwumps were not confronted with it on the floor. That they were so abnormally sensitive to criticism never occurred to me.

This attack upon me for following custom is an attack on the conduct no less than on the rights of every member of this House. Nearly every Democrat felt and said the RECORD was open to his own discretion in using it, if private character was not assailed, by the vote he gave on the question of striking Henry George's book from the RECORD. Here and now I ask every Republican on this floor to refrain from voting on this resolution to expunge; and I ask every Democrat and every Republican not to raise the question of quorum. There are 235 Democrats, 8 Alliance men, and 2 Mugwumps, to only 87 Republicans—nearly three to one. I again ask of you, Republicans, to let them decide as to my offending against the dignity of the House.

Now, had I a right to use that word "Mugwump" on this floor? First, Is there a Mugwump party, and, if so, can any other word than "Mugwump" be properly used to describe it?

Second, What are its principles and practices, as shown by the words, the professions, and conduct of its members?

Make no mistake. To "stop voting the Republican ticket" and joining the Democratic party does not constitute a Mugwump. A belief in free trade is absolutely essential. A peculiar mental and moral quality is also required that can not be attained excepting the process begins very early in life, and it is most successful if started a generation or two back. [Laughter.]

As to the first, the word "Mugwump" was caveated and first applied to these men by one of their own number, the most learned, cultured, and popular Mugwump in Massachusetts, William Everett, LL. D., son of the late Hon. Edward Everett, of world-wide fame. In a speech delivered at Quincy, Mass., September 13, 1884, which I have before me, Mr. Everett named and described his party, and each member of it, in the following words:

And so, fellow-citizens, the matter seems to me to stand. I am an Independent—a Mugwump. I beg to state that Mugwump is the best of American. It belongs to the language of the Delaware Indians; it occurs many times in Eliot's Indian Bible, and it means a great man.

The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WILLIAMS] declared himself a "Mugwump" in the campaign in which he was elected to this House, in a speech delivered in Brookline October 1, 1870, and in many other places; and he further declared that allegiance to the Mugwumps was supreme and inalienable, not dissolved by acting as a Democrat, in the following words, published in the Boston Post:

They have another very serious charge against us who have been for many years Mugwumps [laughter]; that we pretend to be honest and say we are honest; that we have high purposes and high ideals; that we hold political morality above expediency and success. And so we are sneered at as purists and idealists.

The honorable gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO], in the Fifty-first Congress, describes the Mugwumps and sets forth their purposes.

Mr. MCADOO. * * * It is a well-known fact that, more especially in our large cities, there is growing up every year a class of wealthy people of social distinction who are mistrustful of popular government. They find some excuse in the management of our municipalities for arguments restrictive of the suffrage.

These people sometimes pass under the name of Mugwumps, sometimes under the name of "the higher classes," and sometimes they come out boldly and avow their honest purpose, which is to prevent the ordinary citizen from voting without some property or other qualification—(Congressional Record, July 31, 1890, page 7824.)

Hon. Joseph H. Choate, one of the brightest lawyers in New York, gives the following definition:

Mugwump: "A man educated beyond his intellect."

[Loud laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Another quotation from the very honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WILLIAMS], in which the honorable gentleman gives a snatch of personal history and declares the existence of the Mugwump party and gives some of their history.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Massachusetts. I took a prominent, I may say a leading part in what was called the Independent campaign in Massachusetts in 1884, conducted for the purpose of electing a Democratic President. The men who took that course at that time, now labor under the euphonious title of "Mugwumps."—(Congressional Record, March 19, 1892, page 2302.)

After that great movement practically the whole body of the so-called Mugwumps did go over to the Democratic party. If they did not join forces with that party, at least, in the main, voted the Democratic ticket.—(Congressional Record, March 19, 1892, page 2302.)

I think I have proved the existence of a Mugwump party. I come now, in the second place, to the common use of the words to describe the thing, and examples showing what Mugwumps are. The Worcester (Mass.) Spy, in speaking of what London correspondents are saying of the disloyal assistance to British interests by certain men and newspapers in this country, says, on April 1, 1892:

There is an idea here that might well be reflected upon by the Mugwump papers that have recently taken special pains to discredit every movement that the President has taken to uphold the dignity of the United States in the Bering Sea discussion. If weight is given such attacks in the English foreign office as the Tribune correspondent affirms, it is small wonder that Lord Salisbury assumed the tone he did in treating the affair. The most vituperative Tory organ could hardly have more shamefully misrepresented the American side of the question, or heaped more insults upon the head of this nation and the State Department than have these denationalized Mugwump newspapers.

Again, I quote from the same paper:

The Mugwumps have been lashing HILL for his cowardly attempts to hide his position on the silver question. What do they now think of Cleveland, who advances to have a large assortment of political principles, but who has shown himself willing to ignore one of the most vital to secure a supposed party "advantage"?

Now, as showing the common use of the party name "Mugwump," and who they are, I read from the Worcester Telegram, April 1, 1892:

It is a source of amusement these days to read the lectures which the Democratic press is delivering to the so-called independents in politics—the Mugwumps—who Mugwumped the Democratic party in the Rhode Island election, or if they did not then, the Democrats imagine they did. * * * It is still more amusing to find the Democratic editors using the same arguments with their Mugwump friends who have deserted them, and pleading with them in the same cast-off phrases that the Republicans employed years ago and discarded at length in disgust.

It is a satisfaction to see the Democrats struck down by the fellows they have been coddling.

The New York World, yesterday, seriously labored with the Mugwump brethren in an attempt to point out to them the evil of their ways in deserting the Democrats in Rhode Island, and to show them how illogical is their position. It might as well talk to geese. They will heed neither logic nor argument. They are independent; they are Mugwumps. They vote on theories. They can not be expected to be guided by such commonplace and earthly things as facts. How do the Democrats like their friends?

I now refer to the terms in which a leading New York Hill Democratic paper tells what the good Mugwumps do. I read from the Sun of April 10, 1892:

A SEASON TICKET TO DEFEAT.

In 1888 the Democratic party went crazy for tariff reform, and trotted into the mud behind the elephantine economist of the Mugwumps. Licking No. 1.

In 1891 the Ohio Democrats, sticking to the same old tariff reform as propounded by the same old corpulent Cobden, became unprotected mats for Maj. William McKinley, jr., and the Republican party to wipe their feet on. Licking No. 2.

In 1892 the Rhode Island Democrats took up the same old howl and fight for the same old tariff reform and the same old sarcastic dervish. Licking No. 3.

Here are the terms in which the Boston Journal of April 1, 1892, makes a few remarks on Mugwumps:

The antisliver men are not so confident as they were that the silver bill is dead in the House, even for this session. It is possible that the Mugwumps, who have claimed so much credit for what they call the defeat of the bill, and have exposed their ignorance as to the means by which this alleged defeat was accomplished, may be compelled to revise their latest misleading bulletins. In the trail of this free-coinage bill and of the Mugwump relation to it there seem to be only treachery and deception.

A REPRESENTATIVE MUGWUMP AND HIS SAYINGS AND DOINGS—SHOWING WHAT THEY ARE, AND THAT THEY ARE A LAW UNTO THEMSELVES, SUPERIOR TO ANY PARTY OR ANY EXISTING LAW, HUMAN OR DIVINE.

[Boston Traveller, March 22, 1892.]

CHICAGO, March 22.

An Inter Ocean special from San Francisco says: "President C. W. Elliot, of Harvard University, famous in national politics as 'King of Mugwumps,' yesterday declared that he would not vote for HILL in case he is nominated for the Presidency on the Democratic ticket.

"HILL, if nominated, will not get my vote, and he will not get the votes of very many others of my belief in New York and New England."

In which the "King of the Mugwumps" casts John Winthrop, Edward Winslow, and the Pilgrims down to the level of Joseph Smith, Brigham Young, and the Mormons, and makes Plymouth Rock a hissing and a byword.

SURPRISE AMONG NEW YORK ALUMNI—HARVARD MEN HERE DISCUSS DR. ELIOT'S REMARKABLE WORDS—REMARKABLE ADDRESS OF PRESIDENT ELIOT, OF HARVARD COLLEGE, BEFORE A CONGREGATION OF MORMONS IN THE TEMPLE AT SALT LAKE CITY.

As I came over the plains I thought of that early journey, when the first colonists marched across them, under the guidance of a Christian church; and this reminded me of another pilgrimage, though across the water. I refer to the Pilgrim Fathers. They, too, went a long way to escape persecution. They, too, suffered hardships for a principle. They, too, were fired with religious enthusiasm, and sought freedom to worship God. In planting a colony, it is the women who have the harder part. They died faster than the men in Massachusetts. Here you founded a colony that you might worship God according to the dictates of your consciences. Here in this valley has risen the question of religious liberty. In Massachusetts all churches are equal before the law. There is no reason why this religious liberty may not be enjoyed in all the other States and Territories as well as in Massachusetts.—Report of New York Tribune.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The hour allowed under Rule XIV has expired.

Mr. WALKER. I am speaking, Mr. Speaker, as I understand, on a question of personal privilege which is without limit.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I make the point that even on a question of privilege no gentleman can occupy the floor more than an hour. I wish to say, if the Chair will indulge me a moment, I do not want the precedent established that any gentleman can occupy the floor without limit; but if the gentleman from Massachusetts will signify how much longer he wishes to speak, I will ask unanimous consent that his time be extended.

Mr. WALKER. I shall not be unreasonable as to time.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts, who is occupying the floor in defense of himself, shall be permitted to occupy as much time as he may find necessary.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I have not yielded to the gentleman from Maine.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee is entitled to the floor.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I want to have from the gentleman from Massachusetts a statement as to how long it will take him to conclude.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have such time as he may want.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not yield the floor to the gentleman from Maine. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts whether he will indicate how long he wishes to occupy the floor.

Mr. WALKER. I hope I shall be trusted to occupy this floor at my discretion in this cause which is vital to me and to my children after me and not be shut off.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts respectfully to name some time.

Mr. WALKER. I want sufficient time to finish what I have to say.

Mr. RICHARDSON. But I ask the gentleman to name a reasonable time. Would a half hour be sufficient?

Mr. WALKER. I can not specify a particular time. If I am confined within narrow limits, I would necessarily speak so fast as to lose the influence of what I say. I want full time or none.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Then I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended for one hour.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent of the House—

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not yield to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. REED. I ask unanimous consent of the House that the gentleman from Massachusetts be allowed to finish his speech.

Mr. RICHARDSON. And I have asked the House for an extension of the gentleman's time for half an hour.

Mr. REED. Does the gentleman from Tennessee object?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that a half hour's additional time be given to the gentleman from Massachusetts. If there is objection to that request, then the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I insist upon the request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I object to an extension of the time—

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands that there is objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I think that time enough has been spent upon this matter already.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maine.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman from Maine rise?

Mr. REED. For the purpose of submitting a request.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I have not yielded the floor, Mr. Speaker. I reserved the remainder of my time, and I now resume the floor.

Mr. BOUTELLE. This sort of gag is not going to work here, and you might just as well make up your mind to it now as at any other time.

A MEMBER. Well, you have not the floor at this time.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Well, I will have the floor at some time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maine has risen to submit a request.

Mr. REED. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts be allowed to finish his speech: and I wish to state in that connection that I have never known the House of Representatives, in fifteen years' experience, to refuse to grant such a request.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Well, we saw it frequently illustrated under the admirable administration of the gentleman from Maine himself in the last Congress.

Mr. FUNSTON. Thank you for the admission. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will submit the request of the gentleman from Maine. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts may be allowed to continue his remarks until completed.

Mr. BOUTELLE. And I would like to see the man who will object to that.

Mr. CAMINETTI. I object.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Here is a man who objects.

Now I again ask unanimous consent—

Mr. CAMINETTI. I have objected, and the gentleman from Maine may look at me if he wishes to as a man who dares to object.

Mr. RICHARDSON. If the gentleman from Massachusetts will now specify any reasonable time in which he can complete his remarks, I will ask that that time be given to him. That is perfectly fair, I submit to the gentleman, and I ask him, if he will, to indicate some time. If he says one hour, I will ask for an hour.

Mr. REED. Two hours.

Mr. RICHARDSON. No, sir; that is not a reasonable request.

Mr. BLAND. I demand the regular order. Let us go on with something else if the gentleman can not take that which is offered to him.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri demands the regular order.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Then, Mr. Speaker, I believe I have twenty-five minutes of my time remaining.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee reserved the remainder of his time.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Now, I am perfectly willing to divide that time equally with the gentleman from Massachusetts, if he desires it. I will yield cheerfully or I will again request that the gentleman have sufficient time, within reasonable limits. That is perfectly fair.

Mr. MCKAIG. I desire to rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee has the floor.

Mr. MCKAIG. Then I will take some other time.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts indicate some time?

Mr. TARSNEY (and others). Give him an hour.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I have been appealed to several times by the gentleman from Tennessee for an answer to the suggestion that has been made to me.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will an hour be sufficient?

Mr. WALKER. I want to say, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. BLAND. I have demanded the regular order.

Mr. WALKER. If the gentleman will allow me to answer the question they have asked, and which I have not had time to answer—

A MEMBER. Well, why do you not answer it?

Mr. WALKER. Then just be quiet and I will answer.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri demands the regular order. Unless that is withdrawn the Chair can not recognize the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw that if the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] will indicate any reasonable time in which to finish his remarks; but to permit him to print matters in the RECORD and to go on here from hour to hour elaborating them, without giving other gentlemen an opportunity to reply, is unfair.

Mr. McMILLIN and Mr. RICHARDSON addressed the Chair.

Mr. WALKER. I can not reply to the gentleman's question while two or three gentlemen on the Democratic side are speaking at the same time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] is entitled to the floor. To whom does the gentleman yield.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I yield it to the gentleman from Massachusetts in order to allow him to reply to the question.

Mr. WALKER. I have not had the floor yet. You were all talking at once.

Mr. HEARD. You have got it now?

Mr. WALKER. No, I have not. You are all talking at once. Mr. Speaker, I would like a chance now to answer the gentleman's question, if he will allow me to.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. RICHARDSON. I yield to my colleague from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] to make a statement.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I am satisfied that no member on this floor could have any desire to cut off the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER], or any other gentleman, from making a legitimate, straight defense against any charge made against him; and I think that in pursuing that course the gentleman will not be interrupted, and will not find any disposition manifested to cut him off.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Massachusetts has gone on reiterating an attack on other gentleman, and not a personal explanation of his own.

Mr. WALKER. I ask if I am to be permitted to answer the question which was asked me?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WALKER. Now, will he give me a chance to answer him?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Now, I renew the request that the gentleman from Massachusetts be given forty-five minutes in which to conclude his speech. I am willing to be perfectly fair with the gentleman—

Mr. WALKER. Will the gentleman from Tennessee permit me—if he has any gentlemanly instinct—will he give me half a minute in which to answer the question he asked me?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will do that.

Mr. WALKER. Thank you, sir.

Mr. RICHARDSON. You are very welcome.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I want to say that before I will be the means of establishing a rule in this House that when a man is attacked and one charge or twelve charges are made against him that he can not have time to answer them, I will stop where I am or resign—

Mr. TARSNEY. Oh, don't resign!

Mr. WALKER. I will not be the means of setting a precedent that when a man has twelve distinct charges made against him he can not have the same opportunity of making a defense which he would have in a petty court.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The threat of the gentleman will not deter gentlemen on this side of the House from doing their duty as members of the House. Inasmuch as the gentleman has refused and still refuses to indicate any time in which he can conclude his remarks, I submit that it is unfair for this side of the House or for the House—because it is a matter for the House—to be called upon to permit the gentleman to speak without limit. It has never been done, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman from Maine—

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman from Tennessee permit me?

Mr. BOUTELLE. That right never was denied since the House was organized.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS], while occupying the chair in the last House, held that when a member had the floor on a question of privilege, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS] had the floor upon one occasion, the hour rule applied; and when he had spoken an hour upon his question of personal privilege the floor was taken from him.

Mr. REED. But, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. RICHARDSON. So, Mr. Speaker, we are not enforcing any new rule.

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman permit me?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Maine?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will—for how long?

Mr. REED. For one minute.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. REED. I am quite sure that there can not be found an instance in the history of the House of Representatives where a man has been charged, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] has, and proceedings have been undertaken against him, in which the House has undertaken to limit him or in which the House has refused to allow him to finish his speech.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Never.

Mr. REED. I do not believe an instance of it can be found, and I am quite sure that I do not appeal in vain to the sense of justice on the part of members of the House not to set such a precedent. It must have been under aggravating circumstances if any such thing has ever occurred; and certainly the speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] has been temperate and reasonable.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, in the last House where we had a question of this kind raised, when a motion was made to exclude the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Kennedy] from the permanent RECORD, my recollection is that upon a report made by the Committee on the Judiciary the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Kennedy] was permitted to make an explanation which did not exceed a half an hour in length. My impression is he was limited to thirty minutes by a rule or an agreement. But at any rate, Mr. Speaker, that is by the way; and I again appeal to the gentleman from Massachusetts, and to show him that I am perfectly sincere in it I will make the request again, and let the objection come if it is made. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be permitted to continue his remarks for one hour.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] be allowed to continue his remarks for one hour. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] is allowed by the House to continue his remarks for one hour.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I have only this newspaper extract, and then I go to the RECORD.

I do not present these examples of what Mugwumps are and do in any criticism of Harvard College. My best friends, the best men I ever knew, as well as my own sons, are Harvard men. The Mugwump is to-day the same to politics as the Doughface was before the war. It is the same mental quality and moral perception that makes them free traders and apologists for and defenders of the Mormons, that caused the king of the Doughfaces, Samuel Atkins Eliot, to vote, alone among New England members, for the fugitive slave law on September 12, 1850. Grand old Harvard does not "make Mugwumps." The distemper is bred in the bone.

It is due to Harvard men to give the following expression of their views by the leading Harvard man in New York, Theodore Roosevelt, in Boston Herald, April 11, 1892:

In some of the Southern papers I saw comments on President Eliot's plea for and justification of Mormonism.

The so-called persecution of Mormons stands just on a par with the persecution of the Molly Maguires in Pennsylvania, and of the Whyo gang by the New York City police. A religion of which the most prominent tenet was adultery, and which, during its brief term of life, has officially sanctioned such crimes as theft, is not one which we need be tender in handling. The memory of the Mountain Meadow massacre and of the hideous infamy of the Danites, should serve as an estoppel to any plea in behalf of the Mormons.

Mr. Speaker, I now ask to have read from the desk extracts which I will cite from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of this Congress and in the Fifty-first Congress.

I ask to have read a quotation in which the honorable gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] describes and freely uses the word "fraud," as he had a perfect right to do under the rules as interpreted by the practice of this House, and seems to have the Mugwumps in his mind's eye.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The extracts will be read in the time of the gentleman.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, in accord with the overwhelming majority of the Republican party I am opposed to the free coinage of silver. I am equally opposed to assisting certain gentlemen to perpetuate upon this country the fraud of 1890, which has been proclaimed here to-day by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WILLIAMS], although he failed to state that he not only proclaimed it, but represented it here. [Applause and laughter.]—Congressional Record, March 8, 1892, page 1898.

Mr. WALKER. I also ask the Clerk to read another extract in which the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] exercised his parliamentary right to talk to the Mugwumps.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BOUTELLE. * * * I am not in favor of obscuring, in a great Presidential campaign, one of the leading issues that ought to go before the people for the sake of aiding the State of Massachusetts to maintain a Mugwump kindergarten at the expense of the United States. [Laughter and applause.]—Congressional Record, March 8, 1892, page 1898.

Mr. WALKER. Here is a quotation in which the honorable gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] concludes his remarks to the Mugwumps.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BOUTELLE. * * * Now, Mr. Speaker, these gentlemen from Massachusetts, these guileless political infants [laughter] and prodigies of statesmanship, are not going to persuade the Republican party into the old-fashioned business of pulling chestnuts out of the fire for their delectation.—Congressional Record, March 8, 1892, page 1898.

Mr. COGSWELL. Will the gentleman allow me?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to his colleague?

Mr. WALKER. For one moment.

Mr. COGSWELL. I want to ask a question for information, as it may determine my action in voting upon this resolution. This report was made after the speech of my friend on this side and the reply of my friend on the other. It is an important consideration to my mind in regard to the gentleman's speech on my left that it was put in the RECORD without being delivered; but I think if one has infringed upon the rule possibly the reply is also an infringement of the rule.

Mr. WALKER. Now, I hope the gentleman will not take any more time than is necessary.

Mr. COGSWELL. Now, I ask the chairman of the committee, and possibly my colleague on the other side, whether or not, as he knew he was about to make his reply, he gave any notice to the gentleman on this side? I ask that question because I remember the morning I saw him waiting for recognition from the Speaker, and I found my friend on the left in the Members' gallery. I sent word to him that I thought the gentleman on the other side was about to call up his remarks of the other day, and he replied, "Oh, no; I have received no notice." I sent word to him he had better come onto the floor. Whether he did or not at the right time I do not know.

Now, I think it is a matter that we should know, because clearly if the speech has infringed parliamentary law, the reply has. If one goes out of the RECORD, the other ought; if one stays in the other ought. And I would like to ask my friend [Mr. WILLIAMS of Massachusetts] whether he gave notice of his intention to reply. I am not assuming that he did not. I am willing to admit that he did give due notice. I call on him for the information.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield so that I may make a reply.

Mr. WALKER. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Massachusetts. I can answer the question, Mr. Speaker, in a very few words. On the evening before the day I took the liberty to call attention of the House to the gentleman's remarks I wrote a letter to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER], saying that I intended at the noon hour on the following day to rise to a question of privilege and to criticize the remarks he had printed in the RECORD. I wrote that letter, and mailed it with my own hand the night before that day.

Mr. WALKER. I would like to ask the gentleman where he mailed that letter?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman has once before indirectly questioned that I sent him that notice. Before I answer any question I desire to ask that gentleman, upon his honor, did he not receive such a letter from me?

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I again ask the gentleman where he mailed that letter? [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WALKER. I hope the gentleman will be kind enough to let me say that I do not make any imputation against him, but I am curious to know where he mailed that letter.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Massachusetts. The gentleman can see from the mail stamp on the letter.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I have the letter here in my hand. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, there [holding up a card] is the "letter." Not only is it the letter, but it is the first "call" of the gentleman [Mr. WILLIAMS] upon me since his arrival in Washington. [Laughter.] The post-mark on this envelope is "Washington, March 18, 3:30 p. m.," only two hours after the gentleman made his speech. And the "letter" reads:

"I shall to-morrow noon refer to your remarks printed in to-day's RECORD. I notify you, that you may be present."

The envelope of this letter, I repeat, shows that it was mailed two hours after he had made his address on the floor of this House.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Massachusetts. I would like to ask the gentleman whether he proposes to hold me responsible for the Republican administration of the post-office? [Laughter.]

MEMBERS on the Republican side. That is "too thin."

Mr. WALKER. This "letter" was sent from the post-office according to the post-office mark on the back of it at 4 p. m., two hours and a half after the hour at which the gentleman spoke on the day on which his speech was delivered. The postmaster informs me that all letters when dropped are taken up and stamped every thirty minutes and sent on delivery seven times a day. I shall not move for any committee of investigation of the gentleman, nor of his words. I relegate him, as I have done before, to his constituents.

Mr. BUSHNELL. It appears that the letter was received soon enough to bring the gentleman [Mr. WALKER] into the House at the time when his colleague [Mr. WILLIAMS] made his speech.

Mr. WALKER. No, sir; it was mailed two hours after the gentleman made his speech. I got it at 6:30 that same evening.

Mr. BUSHNELL. But you were here and heard him.

Mr. BLAND. I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] if he was not present when the speech of his colleague was made?

Mr. WALKER. I was; because my colleague [Mr. COGSWELL] came for me and brought me here.

Mr. BLAND. What object, then, had your colleague [Mr. WILLIAMS] in mailing the letter to you when you were here and heard his speech?

Mr. BOUTELLE. That is not for the gentleman [Mr. WALKER] to say.

Mr. BLAND. I do not see the point of the gentleman reading—

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND]?

Mr. WALKER. No, I do not. I must have my time.

Mr. BLAND. Can you explain what point your colleague could have had in mailing a letter to you after he knew you had heard his speech?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WALKER. Well, I would like to occupy it.

I present now a citation illustrating the freedom of debate under the rules from a speech of one of the most popular members on either side of the House and a Democratic candidate for Speaker, the honorable gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH], who knows the rules as well and observes them as scrupulously as any Democrat on this floor. These remarks are such as have been freely made on this floor without being questioned in any one instance from time immemorial. They furnished a striking example of the freedom allowed debate and criticism of individuals on the floor of the House in direct contravention of the position taken by the Committee on Printing in the resolution to strike my speech from the RECORD.

Possibly I owe it to my colleague [Mr. WILLIAMS] to say to the House that the honorable gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] may have been misled as to his characteristics in counting the capital "I's" in his speech. In excuse for the peppered appearance the capital "I's" give the speech of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WILLIAMS] I ought to suggest that the compositor may have been discouraged by their number and shot the "I's" into the form with a dredging-box. [Laughter.]

I ask the Clerk to read the extract.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HATCH. * * * The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WILLIAMS], with an egotism that I have never heard equaled in this House since I have been a member of Congress, declared substantially that only those who agree with him on this question are Democrats, his exact language being:

"A vote has been taken which shows that there are seventy Democrats in this House who oppose the free coinage of silver, and, I take it, will oppose it to the bitter end. Now, Mr. Speaker, these men are the Democrats of this House."

Why, my young friend, you have not yet learned the first lesson of Democracy [laughter and applause]: you know no more about the principles and usages of the Democratic party than you know what is going on in the world beyond. [Laughter.]

The first duty of a Democrat is to abide by the decisions of its caucusses and conventions, and when the gentleman from Massachusetts undertakes to read me out of the Democratic party I simply resent it with the indignation of a Democrat who never scratched a ticket and never bolted a nomination.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. HATCH. I decline to yield. I never interrupted the gentleman during his hour.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Massachusetts. I did not refer to you personally, and you have referred to me personally. I desire to ask a question.

Mr. HATCH. If I had unlimited time I would be very glad to give the gentleman all the time he might wish.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Massachusetts. Can you refer me to a Democratic platform that ever declared for free silver?

Mr. HATCH. I have already answered that question. I think effectively.

When you want a Democratic platform, you will get it from Democrats and not from men whose swaddling clothes have not been on them a week, or a month, or a year. The gentleman gets up here—

Mr. WILLIAMS of Massachusetts. You want to read me out, do you?

Mr. HATCH. No, sir; I do not want to read you out. I am simply repelling your endeavor to read me out; but I will tell you what I will do with you: You said the other day, and two or three of your colleagues have said the same, that the time was coming when the Democratic party of the United States must choose between the Democrats of New England and the "Alliance" of the South; as you stated it, "either the Farmers' Alliance of the South or a Democratic alliance with the North." I am ready to take my stand on that proposition, and I will begin the exchange now. I will swap you for the barefooted statesman from Kansas [laughter]; he is a better Democrat than you are and will vote for more Democratic measures in this Congress than you will. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Massachusetts. What is your choice?

Mr. HATCH. And I will take one of your colleagues, and if, by swapping him off, I can win back the young Democrat from Georgia who has gone astray I will be glad to make the exchange; and if that will not be accepted I will throw in another Massachusetts Mugwump to make the bargain.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Massachusetts. But you will not give me the floor.

Mr. HATCH. Yes, Mr. Speaker, here are two of these gentlemen claiming to be Democrats, yet their names, when this House was organized, although they sat in a Democratic caucus, are not recorded for the nominee of that convention for Speaker.

Mr. Speaker, you lost two votes to which you were entitled under all the rules of party organization, but you have gained a great deal more by your courageous and manly course in resisting the blandishments and importunities of this contingent of the Democratic party, by which you have won the admiration and hold the esteem of every Democrat in the United States. [Applause.]—Congressional Record, March 30, 1892, pages 2771, 2778.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman allow me to add a postscript to that?

Mr. WALKER. If you can do it in a minute.

Mr. HATCH. In less than a minute.

Mr. WALKER. All right.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. Speaker, I am very much obliged to the gentleman for giving me the opportunity of saying that as long as I have been a member of this House and as many distinguished gentlemen from all parts of the country as I have served with here I have never seen upon this floor a gentleman that I would be willing to swap for the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER]. [Great laughter.]

Mr. WALKER. The remark of the gentleman simply illustrates the license of speech on this floor.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to present just one example, furnished by a man in private life, all others will be for the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, in which the great example and exponent of all that is good in politics, in both Democrat and Mugwump, finds expression and sets an example to all mankind in talking of "deceiving workmen" and "giving the lie to its professions" and tells the Republican party to heed the words: "Thou shalt not steal."

The workingman who has been deceived ought certainly to be no longer cajoled by a party whose performance has so clearly given the lie to its professions. * * *

The Ten Commandments are thousands of years old, but they and the doctrine of tariff reform will be taught and preached until mankind and the Republican party shall heed the injunction, "Thou shalt not steal."—Providence Sunday Journal, April 3, 1892. Grover Cleveland to an audience in Providence, R. I.

Mr. WALKER. I present next an extract in which the honorable gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. ALLEN], of sound sense, entirely within the rules as applied in this House, suggests scandal concerning John Wanamaker, and questions the conscientiousness of the President, and "names" members of the "august body elsewhere":

Mr. ALLEN of Mississippi. * * * After the election I remember to have talked to several of you gentlemen on the Republican side of the House, and you were innocent enough to believe in the sincere conscientiousness of the President, and you repudiated the scandal and said John Wanamaker would not be in the Cabinet; but you were mistaken; the pledges to Mr.

QUAY and by Mr. QUAY had to be kept.—Congressional Record, April 23, 1890, page 3685.

Hundreds of cases of the names of Senators in connection with their action in the Senate fill the RECORD.

I made no allusion to any Senator excepting in connection with his doings as a citizen, and not as Senator or in the Senate, excepting to give a record of their votes on the silver bill. Their votes for the free coinage of silver were not to their credit, I admit.

Mr. Speaker, the greatest surprise for me in the report was the following:

He assails members of the coordinate legislative branch by mentioning them by name in a vulgar or common way, as shown in a preceding quotation, and charging them with the effort to control the legislation of the House through its Speaker, as shown by the following language:

"I consider it one of the highest compliments I have received since I began my service here that the head of the silver interest in Washington, the venerable patriarch Senator from Nevada, should reveal the fact that he thought it necessary to assist in the councils of the Democratic party, and therefore requested Speaker CRISP not to reappoint me to a place on the Coinage Committee."

Mr. Speaker, I am surprised beyond measure that I should be charged with speaking insultingly of Senators because I used that language. Why, sir, there is not a man who has seen Michael Angelo's Moses in the church of S. Pietro in Vincoli, in Rome, but has been struck with its likeness to Senator STEWART, with his commanding figure and flowing beard. He has been pointed out from the galleries as almost a duplicate of that statue. [Laughter.] I lived in the same house with him one and a half years after I came here. I enjoyed his company then more than that of any man in Washington, and we have always been on the best of terms, and I supposed that I was paying him a compliment when I used those words.

Mr. BLAND. Does the gentleman claim that he spoke those words on the floor of this House?

Mr. WALKER. I claim that I spoke those words in compliment, and that I spoke them on the floor of this House just as three-fourths of the words in "set debate" in the RECORD are spoken on the floor of this House.

Mr. BLAND. The complaint about your words is that they were not spoken on the floor, but were printed in the RECORD.

Mr. WALKER. That is not the complaint, and I say to the gentleman please not, interrupt me again. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLAND. My point is that the gentleman from Massachusetts is not proceeding in order. He was charged with having printed in the RECORD certain matter—

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. BLAND. He was charged with printing certain matters in the RECORD; and now, instead of defending himself against that charge as presented to the House by a committee who have investigated the subject, he is going to work to get up a campaign document, I suppose, and making attacks upon members on this floor and Senators of the United States, and is not speaking in his own defense at all. Having had an hour, and then his time extended for the purpose of defending himself, he now, speaking under the courtesy of the House, instead of defending himself, goes on to make a speech to some extent at least in defamation of Senators and of members upon this floor.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I hope this will not come out of my time. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will have read again paragraph 4 of Rule 14.

The Clerk read as follows:

If any member, in speaking or otherwise, transgress the rules of the House, the Speaker shall, or any member may, call him to order; in which case he shall immediately sit down, unless permitted, on motion of another member, to explain, and the House shall, if appealed to, decide on the case without debate; if the decision is in favor of the member called to order he shall be at liberty to proceed, but not otherwise; and, if the case require it, he shall be liable to censure or such punishment as the House may deem proper.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Missouri calls the gentleman from Massachusetts to order. Is the Chair correct?

Mr. WALKER. Will you let me read what the committee says?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rule—

Mr. WALKER. I ask to read the charge that the committee make against me.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The rule is imperative. The gentleman from Missouri calls the gentleman from Massachusetts to order; and the rule applying to the case provides that the member called to order "shall immediately sit down unless permitted, on motion of another member, to explain; and the House shall, if appealed to, decide on the case without debate; if the decision is in favor of the member called to order he shall be at liberty to proceed, but not otherwise." Now the question is, Shall the gentleman from Massachusetts proceed?

Mr. WALKER. Allow me to state what I am speaking of—

The SPEAKER pro tempore (having put the question on allowing Mr. WALKER to proceed). The ayes have it; the gentleman will proceed.

A MEMBER. In order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In order.

Mr. WALKER. I have a list of fourteen charges made against me by the committee. One of them is assailing members of a coordinate branch, mentioning them by name in a vulgar and common way. Now, if I have not the right to vindicate myself against such a charge as that I have no rights on this floor.

The eminently proper and descriptive title "venerable patriarch Senator from Nevada" sprang naturally to my lips, as it does to the lips of all who know him best, and out of a kindly feeling and in compliment.

In the Washington Post, April 17, 1892, I find:

A striking figure in the Capitol at Washington draws the curious eyes of sightseers. It is that of a Senator, a stalwart and stately veteran from snow-capped Nevada, the frosted silver State. Silver white is his hair. Silvered too is the patriarch's beard that flows over his breast. Yet he still lacks several years of the patriarch's age of three score and ten.

The story of his life is a drama. He still holds the stage as a leading old man, but in his zenith he was a star of the first magnitude. Then he was a State maker—the master mind in the most marvelous mining camp this world has seen, on the crest of that marvel of nature, the Comstock Lode.

In the grave and suave old Senator at the Capitol a passing glance would see small likeness to the long-limbed, raw-boned, red-haired adventurer enveloped in a yellow duster with flapping skirts, who climbed the Sierras to seek his fortune.

But in the busy, unkempt adventurer was the unflagging energy, the unflinching nerve, the fourteen-hour working power, the bold ambition, the dashing insight, the readiness of adaptation, the hard sense, the colossal self-assertion that lifted the man above the muck in a few months' time to the head of the bar in the turbulent camp, and presaged his grip upon the reins and whip that guided and lashed the plunging team of the new Territory of Nevada.

I arraigned the personal motives of no man, but I did arraign men and a party for what they distinctly proclaimed their political purpose to be, as I had a right to do. Again, the chairman says:

The consequences of a measure may be reprobated in strong terms; but to arraign the motives of those who propose to advocate it is a personality and against order.

Mr. Speaker, I ask you to compare my words with the following citations, in which the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WILLIAMS] suggests that the Democrats who favor free coinage of silver are "giving the lie" to the pledges of Democrats:

Mr. WILLIAMS of Massachusetts. It justified its administration of four years in its opposition to silver, and now appears here in the name of Democracy, voting for free silver coinage, giving the lie to those pledges made to the people. I tell you, Democrats of the South and West, you will hear from this business. In the North pledges to the people mean something.—Congressional Record, March 8, 1892, page 1898.

In which the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WILLIAMS] gives an example of courtesy to a fellow member, and used very plain language, and also manifests the same anxiety about Democratic pledges that moved me to address a few remarks to the country on March 16:

Mr. OWENS. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Massachusetts. No, sir; you may not ask me a question. [Laughter.]

Pledges in the North mean something. Upon the pledges of the Democracy a great majority has been made out of a minority. How was the majority made up?

Mr. BOUTWELL. By lying. [Laughter on the Republican side.]—Congressional Record, March 8, 1892, page 1898.

In which the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WILLIAMS] declares who are Democrats, and that the pretended Democrats who favor free silver have bad consciences:

Mr. WILLIAMS of Massachusetts. A vote has been taken which shows that there are seventy Democrats in this House who oppose the free coinage of silver, and I take it, will oppose it to the bitter end. Now, Mr. Speaker, these men are the Democrats of this House. [Great laughter.] Yes, you may laugh; but consciences require some consolation.—Congressional Record, March 8, 1892, page 1898.

In which the same honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WILLIAMS] accuses the Republicans from Massachusetts of "sacrificing their convictions" in voting for the silver law of June 14, 1890, and broadly hints Republicans from Massachusetts are not here with an "honest purpose":

Mr. WILLIAMS of Massachusetts. * * * The people of Massachusetts passed their verdict, not upon you gentlemen who come here with an honest belief in the free coinage of silver and vote your convictions; they put their stamp upon the men who did sacrifice their convictions for party success.—Congressional Record, March 19, 1892, page 2302.

In which the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WILLIAMS] accuses the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] of "treachery" and of "sacrificing his convictions" for the purpose of "making political capital," and this in a speech presented to the House as the Mugwump model of parliamentary propriety, made upon his motion to strike from the RECORD five and a half columns of a speech for containing certain words:

Mr. WILLIAMS of Massachusetts. * * * We have again exposed the treachery of the gentleman and his associates to their cause. [Applause.] When, by an alliance with all honest opponents of free coinage this policy might, as I believe, have been defeated, where was the gentleman from Worcester. Again sacrificing his constituents and his convictions for the purpose of making political capital out of the greatest question that could possibly be presented for his consideration.—Congressional Record, March 19, 1892, page 2302.

Is there a gentleman on this floor who will say my remarks, modest in the extreme, as compared with this and the other remarks of the gentleman, ought to go out of the RECORD, upon the motion of this Mugwump, and this stuff of his ought not be submitted to the Committee on Printing for official examination?

In which the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CROSBY] says the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] made a statement "absolutely false," knowing it to be false, when he knew no answer could then be made, as I was in Rhode Island:

Mr. CROSBY. Mr. Chairman, possibly no answer is called for by such an attack upon myself or my colleagues. I do not speak for them. They are abundantly able to take care of themselves. So far as I am concerned, however, I denounce the statement made by the gentleman [Mr. WALKER] as absolutely false to his certain knowledge. I claim to have been elected to Congress by means of honest methods and clean politics, and I would say further to the gentleman that the commission which entitles me to my seat in this body represents the will of the plurality of the votes of the district which I have the honor to represent, and was obtained without fraud and without deception. I resent the imputation of the gentleman from Worcester, not only because it is personal to myself, but because it is an insult to my constituents.—Congressional Record, March 31, 1892, page 2873.

This statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CROSBY] is thoroughly unworthy of him. When he denounced my statement "as absolutely false to his (my) certain knowledge," he knew that the two gentlemen from Massachusetts [Mr. WILLIAMS and Mr. HOAR], not I, were the authors of the statement that "no Democrat could be reflected from New England if the bill for free coinage of silver passed the present House," and that my remarks were founded upon their statement, and he also knew that my criticism and denunciation of the Mugwump was not a criticism of their private or personal character or conduct, but of political conduct and political morality, which falls lower in Mugwumps than in any other partisans. Neither did I hint at any corruption of the ballot by any one of them anywhere.

Mr. Speaker, will gentlemen compare the following Scripture allusions with those of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WILLIAMS] and consider his use of Scripture in epithets to me:

Mr. WALKER. Is this arraignment too severe? If it is, I will gladly change it. I prefer to say pleasant things, but truth is truth. The great Reformer of 1840 years ago said words of great severity of men who were the leaders of society, morality, of benevolence, and of religion, whose character by the then standards was as high as that of Boston Mugwumps.

In which the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WILLIAMS] declares that the words quoted above as used by his colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] is profanity and blasphemy.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Massachusetts. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have listened to profound profanity. I have heard blatant blasphemy, but for a rock-based, sky-piercing monument of sacrilege (blasphemy) commend me to these words of the gentleman from Massachusetts, in which he compares this brutal attack upon his fellow members in the House with the rebuke of the Saviour of men to the scribes and Pharisees. [Laughter and applause.]—Congressional Record, March 19, 1892, page 2301.

In which the same honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WILLIAMS] pronounces the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] one of the "Scribes and Pharisees," within the lines of parliamentary law, and sets an example in his own words of his idea of what words should be used by one gentleman in addressing another gentleman in a "firm but respectful manner," as he proclaimed his purpose to be, as follows:

Mr. WILLIAMS of Massachusetts. Now, Mr. Speaker, I will advert to the substance of these remarks, and I am entitled to speak with respect to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] in a firm but respectful manner, and to call the attention—

Mr. WILLIAMS of Massachusetts. * * * Probably the gentleman from Worcester will not recognize himself as one of the persons addressed in these words:

"The Scribes and the Pharisees sit in Moses's seat: All therefore whatsoever they bid you observe, that observe and do, but do not ye after their works, for they say and do not."

[Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] "For they bind heavy burdens and grievous to be borne, and lay them on men's shoulders; but they themselves will not move them with one of their fingers."

I have borne the burden, and the gentleman from Worcester is here. Once more:

"But woe unto you, Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites, for ye shut up the kingdom of heaven against men; for ye neither go in yourselves, neither suffer ye them that are entering to go in."—Congressional Record, March 19, 1892, page 2302.

Notonly so, but the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WILLIAMS] went outside of the rule laid down by the chairman of the Committee on Printing in his report by referring to the "gentleman from Worcester" no less than eight times, instead of the "gentleman from Massachusetts," undoubtedly deliberately and perhaps in compliment, for while he carefully revised his speech in some respects he did not correct it in this respect. I think a critical examination of my speech referred to the Committee on Printing, or my reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WILLIAMS], under this great provocation, will disclose no such language as he had used. Neither does any part of my speech the committee recommends to be struck from the RECORD contain language at all obnoxious to the rules of the House as interpreted by the honorable gentleman, Mr. WILLIAMS, in his own speeches or as interpreted by action under them by others. If any one of these citations of the speeches of Mr. WILLIAMS does not condemn his whole speech and require them to be struck from the RECORD of March 8 and March 19, then my speech must stand. I am making no complaint of this. That the constituents of the honorable gentleman ought to settle this case with him is my contention. The customs of the House from "time immemorial" so say. The report of the committee says to the contrary. Which will you choose?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Massachusetts rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] yield to his colleague [Mr. WILLIAMS]?

Mr. WALKER. No, sir, I can not; my time is too limited.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts declines to yield.

Mr. CROSBY rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] yield to his colleague [Mr. CROSBY]?

Mr. WALKER. I can not yield; I have only a few moments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts declines to yield.

Mr. WALKER (resuming). In which the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. COOLIDGE] illustrates the motive of the ruling of Speaker REED, by coupling it with that of Guiteau, the assassin of President Garfield.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Massachusetts. I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman cannot rise to a question of privilege while another member is on the floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I will once more beg the gentleman to allow me to ask him—

Mr. WALKER. I can not yield; the gentleman knows my time is limited.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts declines to yield.

Mr. WALKER (resuming)—

Mr. COOLIDGE. * * * The assassin of 1861 had as much right to walk up the avenue to yonder statue unmolested as the purest person in Washington; but the purpose for which he went—the assassination of President Garfield—was one of the greatest crimes known to man. It was not the counting of the quorum that I so much object to, but the purpose for which it was counted.—Congressional Record, April 3, 1892, page 3069.

In which the honorable gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] broadly hints that the McKinley bill was passed to secure for its supporters vast sums of money to carry the elections.

Mr. McMILLIN. * * * But at last the mask was dropped in this Hall. The exigencies of the preceding campaign had required a vast amount of money to carry the elections. It was raised by rousing the apprehensions of some and promising benefits to others. The promises of that campaign were put into statutory form.—Congressional Record, March 11, 1892, page 2031.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a word with reference to the report of the committee on the words "hot shot for Mugwumps," etc. I wish to say that I hold in my hand a manifold copy of what I sent to the Printing Office, exactly as it was sent, with no mark upon it; that when it went there there were some places for quotations that were not filled in. The Printer sent a messenger to my office for the missing quotations. I took hastily, my clerk being there, what I supposed was another copy like the one sent, but containing the omitted words, in order that the printer might insert these words, found in the second copy where they were omitted in the first copy, instead of which he did what in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred would have been the proper thing for him to do, he substituted the perfect copy for the other, which, as it proved, he ought not to have done, because in this case he substituted different matter; that is to say, the words objected to. And he was wholly to blame, if anyone.

Mr. CROSBY rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. WALKER. No, I do not; I cannot. I have only a limited time; these gentlemen have all the rest of the session. Now, I wish to say that when that copy came to me with those headlines, I did not understand how it got in there, unless it was put in by others, for I know I did not put it in.

Mr. CROSBY. How did it happen to be written in the first place?

Mr. WALKER. It was written for the newspapers; and I had a right to write it for the newspapers. It was sent to the newspapers and published by the newspapers, and approved of as about the most truthful and clear exposition of "Mugwumps" that had appeared in Massachusetts.

Now, I had four days in which to correct my speech in the RECORD. Neither the Speaker of this House, nor the committee, nor the whole House, could hinder me from doing so, under the rules; and those words were not "in that speech" when the Committee on Printing took it, for I had taken them out of it, as I had a perfect right to take them out. I had four days under the rules to take them out. What the committee say in their report can not be justified upon any principle of fair dealing; for the gentleman says in his report that I took them out the second day after the speech appeared in the RECORD. The gentleman knows the rules of the House, and knows that I had the right to take them out even if I had put them in, which I did not do, and he knew they were not "in the speech" when he wrote his report. The report of the committee on that point is not, I hope and trust, with malicious intent.

Here is a further extract in which the honorable gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] declares that Congress made a cowardly surrender to Harrison the Second, and sold its birthplace for a mess of pottage:

Mr. McMILLIN. * * * But it turns out that we rebelled against George the Third and high taxation in 1776, only to make a cowardly surrender to Harrison the Second and higher taxation in 1890. What should we say; what will posterity think of this action?

Mr. McMILLIN. For what purpose is the gentleman having this read?

Mr. WALKER. It is read to show the custom of the House under the rule and the freedom with which gentlemen are in the habit of expressing themselves in regard to public matters.

Mr. McMILLIN. Then I wish to say to the gentleman that every word of that I stand by now.

Mr. WALKER. My claim is that the gentleman had a perfect right to use the language which I am quoting, and that he would not have served his constituents if he had not done so if he believed the words true when he uttered them. That is my contention. My contention is that if these gentlemen who used the language I have quoted here, and shall quote, believed what they said, then they were exercising the right which they were entitled to exercise under the rules in so doing.

This continues as follows:

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, the world has spent thousands of years in anathematizing one base man on account of selling his birthright and heritage for a mess of pottage. What will it think of those who have given away their blood-bought heritage and got no pottage? What new curse will it invent for them?—Congressional Record, March 11, 1892, page 2032.

Mr. McMILLIN. I stand by that.

Mr. WALKER. I stand by the right of the gentleman from Tennessee in using that language in view of his belief. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BURROWS. Not in the sentiment.

Mr. WALKER (continuing). But not in the sentiment he utters. I am standing here for liberty of debate in this House, and, furthermore, I say to you I am going to have it.

Mr. BURROWS. It does not look very much like it.

Mr. WALKER. Well, I think I will somehow or other. I say that before 235 men on this floor will condemn me, they will hear what I have to say, especially when I am simply advocating now the principle that every Democrat has advocated from the time of Jefferson, the time of Jackson, even back to the days of the Constitution, that there shall be absolute and untrammelled freedom of debate on public matters on this floor, and that any words may be spoken here that do not impugn the private personal character of the individual.

The chairman accuses me of assailing the Speaker, and says I accused the Speaker of improper motives, as follows:

At one place in his remarks he assails the Speaker of the House, accuses him of violating what he terms precedents in order to snub members, and ascribes to him improper motives in appointing a committee of the House, as the following quotation shows:

"The Speaker very properly, to carry out his views, made up the Coinage Committee of this Congress by putting the most determined fighter for free coinage among the Democrats, next to Mr. MILLS, at the head of the Coinage committee, and violated all precedents to snub the Republican party in this House for its devotion to sound money by putting the most determined fighter for free coinage there was in the little band of free-coinage Republicans at the head of the Republicans on that committee to misrepresent the Republican party on that question on the floor of the House."

On the contrary, as every right-minded man would read it, the extract recites a fact and commends it:

No. 6. Violated the rules in criticising the purpose of the Committee on Rules in not including "cloture" in their order for debating the free coinage of silver bill.

In the next sentence, referring to the action taken by the Committee on Rules providing for the consideration of the bill for free coinage of silver, he uses the following language:

"It looks to me as though the order now before us was passed by the Committee on Rules for the sole purpose of providing the means of continuing the fraud."

That was my opinion then, and it is my opinion now, and this House knows the result was exactly what was predicted.

How do other members commend the present Speaker and Speaker REED?

Here is one in which the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WILLIAMS] accuses the Speaker of organizing the House to force the free coinage of silver bill on the House:

Mr. WILLIAMS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, this question goes deeper into politics than anybody supposes.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. You are right about that.
Mr. WILLIAMS of Massachusetts. And the organization of this House has been directed to forcing this question upon the House.—Congressional Record, March 8, 1892, page 1898.

In which the honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. TRACEY] criticises the Chair for his decisions and his demeanor toward him:

Mr. BLAND. I move to lay the appeal upon the table and hope it will be done. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. TRACEY. I desire, Mr. Speaker—
The SPEAKER. That motion is not debatable. The Chair will state the question.

Mr. TRACEY. I trust the Chair will not take me off the floor in that way. The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not on the floor. What does the gentleman mean by that? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. TRACEY. I mean, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from New York is very well aware of what he means, and he will take an opportunity to answer the Chair in a respectful and prompt manner—
The SPEAKER. The Chair hopes he will.

Mr. TRACEY. And he does not desire to be looked at by the Chair in that manner. [Laughter.] In the last Congress the gentleman who was then "the gentleman from Georgia," protested against the Speaker looking at him in a certain manner.—Congressional Record, March, 8, 1892, page 1899.

Mr. TRACEY. If in order, I would like to have the rest of that colloquy read, as it was not heard before. [Laughter.]

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, in the last Congress the gentleman from Georgia protested against the Speaker looking at him in a certain manner. We have the parallel in this Congress. But I pass on to a further consideration of these citations, in which the honorable gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] denounces the Speaker as "a tyrant:"

The SPEAKER. The roll call can not be interrupted.
Mr. BLAND. You are not a tyrant to rule over this House, or the members of this House, in any such way, and I denounce you as the worst tyrant that ever presided over a deliberative body. [Applause on the Democratic side.]—Congressional Record, January 31, 1890, page 977.

In which the honorable gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] pronounces the Speaker's decision "corrupt," and is applying gag law:

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. From that we appeal. The Speaker's decision is clearly corrupt. [Loud cheers on the Democratic side.] There is no appeal pending. I repeat, there is no appeal pending to-day. [Renewed applause on the Democratic side.] There was an appeal pending on yesterday, but this appeal is a different one, because the Speaker has assumed that the House will sustain his decision of yesterday, and so he is carrying by his own vote to-day the decision he has just made. [Renewed applause and cheers on the Democratic side.] It does not come within the rule stated by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCKINLEY] and the gag law that the gentleman, with the help of the Speaker, has applied to-day is one that is both usurpatory, revolutionary, and corrupt. [Loud applause and cheers on the Democratic side.]—Congressional Record, January 31, 1890, page 978.

The charge against me is that I spoke where those men could not reply at once, but this language I am positive was addressed towards a man who not only could not reply at once, but could not reply at any other time, because he was "the Speaker of the House" and as such was prevented from doing so.

In which the honorable gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] again accuses the Speaker of tyranny:

The SPEAKER (continuing the reading). Mr. CRISP, Mr. CULBERSON of Texas, Mr. DOCKERY, Mr. DUNPHY, Mr. ENLOR, Mr. FLOWER—
Mr. BLAND. The Speaker may be deaf to my appeal, but it is on account of a tyranny that the House is getting sick and tired of.—Congressional Record, February 1, 1890, page 997.

In which the honorable gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] accuses the Speaker of tyranny, and in which the honorable gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] accuses the Speaker of being "in a demoralized condition:"

The SPEAKER. A sufficient number have risen. The yeas and nays are ordered. The Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. SPRINGER (after the roll call had begun). Well, this is tyranny, simple and undiluted.

Mr. BLAND (speaking amid great confusion and cries of "Order!"). This is an outrage. The House could not be in a more demoralized condition than the Speaker of this House.—Congressional Record, February 1, 1890, page 997.

[Great laughter.]
In which the honorable gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] accuses the Speaker of "running the House by brute force:"

The SPEAKER. There being a constitutional quorum present for the transaction of business, the Journal is approved.

Mr. DOCKERY. No quorum.
Mr. BLAND. I think that those sick gentlemen who are present should be excused. The Speaker is finding a quorum without them, and there is no necessity for their being here.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia.
Mr. BLAND. The Speaker is running it by brute force.—Congressional Record, February 2, 1890, page 1008.

There is great good in this thing, for it will be a better education for the young men in this House than a post-graduate course at Harvard [laughter].

In which the honorable gentleman from Virginia [Mr. O'FERRALL] accuses the Speaker of using autocratic power and of outrage and usurpation:

Mr. O'FERRALL. Let the finger of autocratic power in this House direct the way to those who will follow it. Let the voice of autocratic power sound through these halls and command those who may obey it; but as for me and my people I protest against this usurpation, this outrage, against this violation of the sacred rights of the weak, against this cruel and wicked and unconstitutional violation of the rights of the minority. [Applause on the Democratic side.]—Congressional Record, February 4, 1890, page 1028.

In which the kindly heart of the honorable gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] is moved at such doings, and he deeply regrets that the Speaker should be singled out for animadversion by Democrats, "bad as he is:"

Mr. HATCH. * * * I deprecate, Mr. Speaker, any harsh language or any epithets that have been uttered upon this side of the Chamber addressed to the Speaker of the House (not to the present occupant, but to the Speaker of the House) that does not include in the strictures in that language the entire Republican majority upon the other side.

The Speaker of this House, bad as he is, is no worse than his party. He is no better and no worse.—Congressional Record, February 12, 1890, page 1218.

In which the honorable gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOR] accuses the Speaker, because of his observance of his oath of office, as defined by the Supreme Court of the United States, the most august tribunal in the world, of "debauching the constitutional record of the House:"

Mr. ENLOR. * * * The Speaker of the House of Representatives has debauched the constitutional record of the proceedings of the House and impeached its verity by directing the Clerk to make an unwarranted and an unauthorized entry on the Journal, showing the names of certain members alleged by the Speaker to be "present and not voting."—Congressional Record, February 16, 1890, page 1306.

In which the honorable gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] asks "upon what meat doth this our Cæsar feed," and declares that we were not sent here to bow down to Speaker REED in an ignoble despotism [great laughter]:

Mr. McMILLIN. * * *
Upon what meat doth this our Cæsar feed,
That he is grown so great?

Why, sir, are we who are sent here to perpetuate a Republic required to thus "bow down ignobly to a despotism?" For, sir, I assert, and fair-minded men will agree with me, that when this code of rules adopted the House of Representatives will have been converted into the worst despotism on this continent and one of the worst on the earth.—Congressional Record, February 25, 1890, page 23, Appendix.

In which the honorable gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] declares to the Speaker that his conduct is "dictatorial, tyrannical, and despotic."

The SPEAKER protempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I hope the gentleman is now ready to yield the floor, and I take it in my own right.

Mr. WALKER. I would like about fifteen minutes more.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will give the gentleman ten minutes out of my own time.

Mr. WALKER. Well, I thank the gentleman for the time, but I will not agree not to mention this subject again in the House during this session.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I have no objection.

Mr. WALKER. Now, I ask the Clerk to continue to read the citation.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MILLS. * * * The gentleman who assumes to play the rôle of public prosecutor to vindicate the offended dignity of the House remembers the conduct of the distinguished Representative from Indiana when he was resisting the dictatorial, tyrannical and despotic orders of the Speaker when he was trampling on all the rules of parliamentary law, and when he was hungering for that power which he has been so willing to exert on all occasions in defiance of right.—Congressional Record, May 20, 1890, page 4873.

Mr. WALKER. I have here another extract in which the honorable gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] borrows a simile, and more than hints that the Speaker is "hideous and ugly" [laughter]:

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Well, I am gratified to know that the Speaker has been generally right, although annoying to some of my friends. [Laughter.]

Mr. CRISP. Yes; during this whole session the gentleman and his party if I may be permitted to borrow a simile, have seemed to bow before the Speaker of the House with much the same feeling with which the Hindoo bows before the hideous image of his god: "He knows that he is ugly, but he feels that he is great." [Laughter.]—Congressional Record, June 20, 1890, page 6298.

[Prolonged laughter and applause.]

In which the honorable gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] defines the principle on which the Speaker acts as "that of pirates," and his conduct concerning the silver bill as "infamous:"

Mr. ROGERS. The Speaker has informed us, and I suppose the rule will be enforced, when gentlemen interrupt gentlemen on the floor the interruptions will not be allowed to go into the Record. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

"The end justifies the means." That principle inspires the pirate on the high seas to rob and scuttle a ship. * * * I consider this the climax in the application of that principle, when he overturned the Constitution of the Republic, throttled and destroyed the independence and individuality of the members of this House, subjected the majority of the House to the power of a single man, to force and whip members back here who went away to avoid voting on this election bill, and brought about this infamous miscarriage of the silver bill against the will of the majority of the House, and, indeed, characterizes the entire proceedings of the Fifty-first Congress.—Congressional Record, July 11, 1890, page 7114.

In which the honorable gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. Rogers] makes a few additional remarks, and speaks of the ill-breeding of the Speaker [laughter]:

Mr. ROGERS. * * * Mr. Chairman, you have invoked this bloody, inquisitorial code of rules; you have put in that Chair this man, whom many of us think has usurped power, who has been partial, who has ridiculed members upon the floor of the House, who has carried his ill-breeding into the Chair from the floor of this House.—Congressional Record, August 5, 1890, page 8113.

In which the honorable gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. Rogers] calls the Speaker a bulldozer, and hints at what he deserves and would receive in Arkansas [laughter]:

Mr. FUNSTON. He would make a good Southern bulldozer, would he not? [Laughter.]

Mr. PREL. You ought to know. You have been trying him a good while. Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I think he [the Speaker] would make a good bulldozer in some sections of the country, for he has bulldozed you all, but I do not think he would bulldoze long where I come from. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side, and derisive laughter on the Republican side.]—Congressional Record, August 5, 1890, page 8113.

In which the honorable gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. Rogers] accuses the Speaker of dishonorable motives and character, declaring he has no reverence for anything good, and which free criticism and denunciation was indulged in for days, and the theory and practice of the House being that the constituents of each member will remedy such evils, if they be evils, the provocation, imagined or real, being weighed by the people at the polls. This principle and practice has governed this House from time immemorial, as it did in the last Congress. Will this Democratic Congress reverse this rule?

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, the stream can never rise above its source. What moved the source, Mr. Speaker? Men do not act without motives. The motive and the exigency existed. What was it, Mr. Speaker?

Can it be that you desire to separate yourself in this regard, as nature had separated you in mind, body, and instincts, from all mankind by openly repudiating what Jere Black ironically called, in his great speech in support of good morals and constitutional government before the electoral commission, "the vice of consistency?" No, hardly that; but, if so, it is a perfect part of a harmonious whole, constituting your mosaic public career. Then, too, it were a superfluous performance, for I cheerfully acquit the public of any lurking suspicion that you entertain seriously any reverence for anything good which ever actuated any noble spirit in all the past, provided all that such good thing impeded any partisan end to be attained.—Congressional Record, August 5, 1890, page 8114.

In which the same honorable gentleman addresses a few additional endearing words to the Speaker [laughter]:

Mr. ROGERS. * * * No, Mr. Speaker; but may I tell you, as no sycophant will, that they curse you, and despise you, and hate you, and when you are assailed, in private and in public, they are dumb.—Congressional Record, August 4, 1890, page 8114.

These quotations, and all others which I shall make from the speeches of scores of members, fully sustain the proposition that members are left to their own discretion in speech upon this floor.

In which the same honorable gentleman declares the Speaker to be a scold:

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. Once or twice lately something has been said about my being a scold. Well, sir, no House ought to be without one scold, and as you elected yours to the Speaker's chair, somebody had to take his place on the floor. [Laughter.]—Congressional Record, August 5, 1890, page 8114.

In which the honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. TRACEY] says the Speaker is proceeding in an irregular way, and "attempting to coerce" the House by "arbitrary measures," and that his rulings are the most extraordinary ever heard of in the history of legislative bodies:

Mr. TRACEY. * * * How can a body like the House of Representatives assemble and go to work to carry on its business without doing what has been done in every legislative body on the face of the earth—reading the Journal of the previous sitting, and in a regular way getting to the work before them. It appears to me that this ruling of the Chair is one of the most extraordinary that was ever heard of in the history of legislative bodies.

Now, sir, there is every reason in the world why great care should be taken in attempting to coerce the action of a body like this, or to take any other arbitrary measures in regard to this bill.—Congressional Record, March 8, 1892, page 1187.

In which the same honorable gentleman thinks the Speaker has acted with "undue haste," has ruled in an "erroneous manner," and "forced upon the House an innovation":

Mr. TRACEY. * * * It would be my hope that the Chair, after hearing arguments that might be made in regard to the matter—that the Chair, whom we all recognize to be a just man, in case he determines that he had in undue haste ruled in an erroneous manner, would gladly reverse the ruling and allow us to proceed with the regular business of the House in the regular way, and not force upon the House an innovation.—Congressional Record, March 8, 1892, page 1188.

In which the honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] declares the ruling of the Speaker and the proceeding under it "disorderly":

Mr. BLAND. Why can we not take a vote before reading the Journal as well as afterward, if there is no intention here to filibuster?

Mr. COCKRAN. Because one is orderly and the other is disorderly; that is why.

The SPEAKER will please take their seats; there is no occasion for all this excitement.—Congressional Record, March 8, 1892, page 1189.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Is this in the present Congress? Have we got into the present House?

Mr. WALKER. Oh, yes. [Laughter and applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WALKER. I wish to present just one more extract.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will allow the gentleman to read the extract himself.

Mr. WALKER. I will read the extract, in which the honorable gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] declares the Speaker disorderly:

Mr. CRISP. I appeal from the decision—
Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. It is disorderly: the House has ordered a vote, and the Speaker has no more right to state that fact from the Speaker's chair than we would have from the floor of the House. It is a disorderly proceeding on the part of the Speaker. [Applause on the Democratic side.]—Congressional Record, January 30, 1890, page 949.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I now yield five minutes to my colleague on the committee [Mr. MCKAIG].

Mr. STOCKDALE. I think the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] ought to give the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] an opportunity to complete the biography of the last Speaker. [Laughter.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MCKAIG].

Mr. MCKAIG. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to encroach upon the patience of the House or to occupy more than a few minutes. I have listened to the gentleman with a great deal of pleasure, and particularly to the latter portion of his remarks, in justification of the peculiar manner in which he addressed himself to the two new members of the committee. I must confess, gentleman, that I do not say it in any spirit of self-laudation, but I have not risen in my seat to appeal to the Chair to protect me under the rule when I was held up here by the knight-errant of the silver question as a striking illustration of the argument he was using.

I did not then appeal to the Chair for protection, but I must confess that when I look into the benignant countenance of my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] I do think he goes a little far when he undertakes to say that the decision made in our committee by the two new members was simply the outcome of freshness or of a want of knowledge of the rules of the House. If I could be justified in assuming the position of a tenderfoot in this peculiar political domain it would be in the light of the extracts and citations that the gentleman has been sending up to the desk to be read; because I have no hesitation in saying that we who live outside of the domain of this House, where social amenities and courtesies exist, are not in the habit of addressing ourselves to each other in the language that the gentleman has shown by these quotations to be the customary usage of the House of Representatives of the United States.

If that be the rule here, gentlemen ought to extend to a new member a greater degree of leniency, when he comes here in ignorance of the peculiar usages of your House. Words have been uttered here, according to the extracts that were sent up to be read by the Clerk, that would result in personal antagonism, if not in personal encounter, if uttered outside the House. Why, Mr. Speaker, I recollect when our late lamented friend, John T. Raymond, used to be going around the country in that magnificent play, "Fresh," which was called new—and what is new is fresh, and what is fresh is new—I never expected that I would be exhibiting myself here before the House in the character of the very play that I witnessed.

Now, I can state to the gentleman here that when we, myself individually and my friend from Kansas [Mr. BRODERICK], the other member of the committee, sat upon these matters that were laid before us, we did it in a fair, just, and equitable spirit. Certainly I can not be accused of being drawn to the gentleman of the third party, who is denominated by the gentleman from Massachusetts as a Mugwump, because, according to the gentleman's own language, he is not a member of the Democratic party, and therefore my spirit of fairness would apply just as much to the gentleman from Worcester [Mr. WALKER] as to the gentleman from the other section of Massachusetts [Mr. WILLIAMS], and I will say here that in passing upon the question we did it in a spirit of fairness and of honesty.

Mr. WALKER. Will the gentleman allow me just one word?

Mr. MCKAIG. Yes.

Mr. WALKER. I have not the slightest doubt about that, either as to the gentleman himself or his colleague, and have not intended to hint that I had any doubt on that subject.

Mr. MCKAIG. It may be that we have been ignorant of the peculiar methods of dealing with one another in this House of Representatives; but I hope that in the course of time, as myself and my friend from Kansas [Mr. BRODERICK] get accustomed to these things we will come to understand that when a gentleman on the floor of the House characterizes another in the strongest possible language, when he does that which tends to lower the dignity of the House, when he goes beyond its rules, we will know that he does not mean anything by it; that it is done in a spirit of playfulness; that in speaking of the "effigy of John Harvard" it is simply complimentary, and known to be so within the limits of the State of Massachusetts.

I will assume from what the gentleman says that he did not mean it as any unfairness when he characterized new members as "fresh and young," because we had not happened to have lived within the territorial limits of the State of Massachusetts. I took it for granted that when years have passed over that State, as Massachusetts was one of the earliest of the States, that one of the first and primal things learned in that State is courtesy and respect to people outside the State.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I approach the question which is under discussion in a spirit of great seriousness. I ask this House to consider the report of this Committee in all seriousness, because, sir, the name of the Commonwealth which I have the honor in part to represent is here involved. I have asked to have stricken from the record of this Congress words which I believe bring dishonor to the good name of the noble Commonwealth I represent, which were put into the RECORD, not spoken or uttered upon the floor; personal attacks which were put into the RECORD without opportunity for answer.

Mr. Speaker, that Commonwealth has sent here to occupy the chair you now hold the courteous and noble Winthrop. In this Hall, where we have just listened to the piteous words of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER], Webster has thundered, and here Sumner has pleaded the cause of liberty. Mr. Speaker, I will not allow, if I can have a majority of this House with me, the scandalous words uttered by the gentleman from Massachusetts to remain in the RECORD. To-morrow there will be published—already sent out to the press—the appeal of the gentleman from Massachusetts who represents the Tenth district, in which, Mr. Speaker, he appeals to the House upon the ground that he is one of the laborers of Massachusetts upon whom the Mugwump looks with scorn, and that he is therefore entitled to the sympathy of the House because he represents the "bench." I presume he refers to himself. "The bench, the loom, and the anvil," he says, "have sent out men to claim honors of which the Mugwump is jealous."

Mr. Speaker, in the district which I represent is the town from which came a true son of toil and a true son of Massachusetts; a man who has come next to the Presidency of the United States—Henry Wilson, who truly represents the dignity and courtesy of the Massachusetts artisan.

Mr. WALKER. Will the gentleman allow me one word?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Massachusetts. Not a word. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

And, Mr. Speaker, what a true gentleman is from out of the ranks of the artisans of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts many members of this House will know who have seen the dignified, honorable, and courteous bearing of Nathaniel P. Banks. They, sir, are the true representatives of the shop and of the loom. The anvil is perhaps not represented.

Let me suggest to the gentleman, however, that whether he came from the bench, the loom, or the anvil, it is no excuse for him that he shall bring in here his shop manners with which to regale the members of this House, for even with the honest artisan who indulges in the jibe, or the joke, or the jeer in a shop, when he comes within the heart of his family and into the bosom of his home, those jibes, and jeers, and quips are no longer heard; he respects the ears of the men and women who occupy his house. And when this gentleman comes into this House and faces the men and women of the whole country, he should bear in mind that the manners of the shop must be left behind; that he has in his keeping the dignity and courtesy of the people of Massachusetts.

Mr. CARUTH. Keep on his coat. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Massachusetts. Yes; when he enters the drawing room of the country. [Renewed laughter.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to do more to vindicate the right of my Commonwealth than to have one more verdict passed upon the gentleman from the Tenth district of Massachusetts. I will take the verdict of next fall. I respectfully suggest to the Democrats of this House that if you wish a living proof of the magnificent opportunities of the Democracy of Massachusetts, gaze upon and listen to the gentleman from the Tenth district—the Republican member. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman says that a Mugwump is a man who praises God every day that he is not as other men are. I admit, Mr. Speaker, that I belong to a class which praises God that it does not belong to the class to which some gentlemen belong. I praise God that I am not as some other men are, and without mentioning any names. [Laughter.]

The Mugwump is also described as "a man who is educated beyond his intellect." Mr. Speaker, that is no discredit to any man; but there are some men who ought to be ashamed that their education is on a par with their intellect. [Laughter.] Now, Mr. Speaker, my colleague may take this lesson to himself when this House acts, and he may not. I doubt whether the most serious criticism of this House will ever get through the skin of the gentleman from the Tenth district of Massachusetts; but, sir, I hope he will take the lesson. I hope he will not prove himself to belong to that class of men who can not learn what their constituents demand, what the good name of their Commonwealth demands, and what the honor of the country demands.

The gentleman was already warned by the report of the committee that he was to receive the disapproval of this House for his remarks, but, instead of coming here with apology, he comes here with reassertion and adds to his former offense. Mr. Speaker, this is no trifling matter. It is a matter which should receive the serious attention of this House. But I take it that we shall have the offense repeated to-morrow, and again and again, no matter now badly the gentleman is punished, no matter how seriously this House may act.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, only a word. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER], who occupied the floor so long, endeavored, it seems to me, to justify himself for his violation of the rules of the House and its privileges by citing instances in which other gentlemen had done the same thing. If we concede that the gentleman was correct in his quotations, and that the utterances which he quoted were violative of the rules either in letter or in spirit, that certainly does not justify the gentleman for the gross and palpable violation which he has committed. The committee, without any feeling in the case, as I have already said, simply considered the matter which was referred to them.

The gentleman has criticised the committee because they have not reported a resolution to strike from the RECORD the remarks of other gentlemen, which he says were violative of the rules; but, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman ought to know, if he does not, that the committee have no original jurisdiction of these questions and that they can exercise jurisdiction only of such matters as are referred to them by the House. No such remarks made by other gentlemen have been referred to the committee, and if they were referred, without undertaking to say what the committee would do—for I would not assume to do that—I will say that when any such reference is made the committee will again endeavor conscientiously to do their duty and report accordingly. Now, Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question upon the adoption of the resolutions.

Mr. REED. Before that vote is taken I should like to hear the resolutions read again.

The Clerk read the resolutions, as follows:

Resolved, That the House, deeming it a high duty that the courtesy and decorum required by parliamentary law and practice should characterize debate, and the conduct of members at all times in their official relations, hereby expresses its disapproval of the unparliamentary language used by Hon. JOSEPH H. WALKER, a Representative from the State of Massachusetts, in that portion of his speech printed in the RECORD on the 17th instant, but which was not delivered on the floor. And considering it impracticable to separate the unparliamentary portions of said speech from such parts thereof as may be parliamentary: Therefore,

Be it further resolved, That the Public Printer is directed to exclude from the permanent CONGRESSIONAL RECORD all of that portion of his speech beginning with the words, "Hot shot for Mugwumps—HOAR and WILLIAMS shown up," etc., on page 2259 of the daily RECORD, down to and including the paragraph on page 2261, which closes with the words "but the earmarks are on it," near the bottom of the first column on said page 2261.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on the adoption of the resolutions reported by the committee.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn. [Cries of "No!" "No!" on the Democratic side.]

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. MALLORY, and it was rejected.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, I move that the resolutions be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion to lay the resolutions on the table takes precedence of the motion for the previous question.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The previous question has been ordered.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. REED, and the Speaker pro tempore declared that the yeas seemed to have it.

Mr. REED. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 0, noes 98.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, there does not seem to be any quorum present.

Mr. REED. There is a quorum present, but no quorum is voting. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Maine make the point that no quorum has voted?

Mr. BOUTELLE. I do.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the Chair please state the question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] to lay the resolution on the table.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 0, nays 101, not voting 227; as follows:

YEAS—0.

NAYS—101.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. On this question the yeas are none, the nays 101. No quorum has voted.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. The previous question having been ordered on the adoption of the resolution, will not this question come up next Monday morning as the first thing in order after the reading of the Journal?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The present occupant of the chair could make a ruling; but being temporarily in the chair, he does not think he should undertake to rule as to what may be in order on Monday.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The previous question being ordered, will not this come up as the first thing on Monday under the former practice of the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The present occupant of the chair does not think it would be proper for him to undertake to make a decision to control the occupant of the chair on Monday next. Therefore the Chair thinks the point ought not to be pressed.

Mr. REED. I move to adjourn.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Then I will modify the question and ask the Chair if such has not been regarded as the usual practice in the House.

Mr. REED. I have moved that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I believe I have the floor. I have asked the Chair a parliamentary question in a respectful manner, and I hope the Chair will answer me.

Mr. REED. Is the motion to adjourn in order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks the motion of the gentleman from Maine is in order.

Mr. RICHARDSON. But, Mr. Speaker, I had the floor upon a parliamentary inquiry. If the Chair decides that I am not in order, of course I will yield.

Mr. REED. Regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The present occupant of the chair will make this statement. He is asked to decide a parliamentary point that might well in his judgment be made on Monday. The present occupant of the chair is asked to decide what will come up on Monday, and the Chair thinks it is premature to raise that point now.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Then I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. REED. That is a motion which is already pending, made by myself.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

SENATE.

MONDAY, April 25, 1892.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE AT MEMPHIS, TENN.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 5th instant, a letter from the Chief of Engineers, with an accompanying letter, with sketch, from Capt. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication and accompanying papers will be referred to the Committee on Commerce, and printed.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not know that the communication need have any reference. Let it lie on the table for the present. It will be printed of course in the RECORD, and let it be printed as a document also.

Mr. BERRY. The accompanying letter, I presume, will be printed in the RECORD also.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter of transmittal will be printed in the RECORD, and the accompanying papers not in the RECORD, but as a document.

Mr. BERRY. I ask that the letter of the Chief of Engineers, to which it refers, be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the communication and the letter from the Chief of Engineers will be printed in the RECORD, and the communication and accompanying papers will lie on the table until further order of the Senate, and be printed as a document.

Mr. HARRIS subsequently said: The communication laid before the Senate this morning from the Secretary of War, which I asked be printed as a document, I see contains a map. I ask that the map be excluded. It may involve some unnecessary expense, and it is of a sort not important to the document.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The map accompanying the communication referred to will not be printed unless specially ordered by the Senate.

The communication and accompanying papers are as follows: Letter from the Secretary of War, in response to resolution of the Senate of April 5, 1892, relative to the bridge across the Mississippi River at Memphis.

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington, April 23, 1892.

SIR: In response to a resolution of the Senate dated the 5th instant, directing the Secretary of War to inform the Senate "whether or not the Kansas City and Memphis Railway and Bridge Company, authorized by act of Congress approved April 24, 1888, to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River at Memphis, Tenn., have complied with the portion of said act which required such company to provide for a passageway for wagons and vehicles of all kinds and the transit of animals," I have the honor to invite your attention to the inclosed letter from the Chief of Engineers dated the 21st instant, and its accompanying copy of letter dated the 18th instant, with sketch from Capt. S. W. Roessler, Corps of Engineers, the officer directed to exercise supervision over the construction of the bridge, which letter, the Chief of Engineers remarks, contains the latest advices in his office respecting the bridge at Memphis, and will, it is believed, furnish the information desired by the Senate.

Very respectfully,

S. B. ELKINS, Secretary of War.

The PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES SENATE.

OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
UNITED STATES ARMY,
Washington, D. C., April 21, 1892.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt from the War Department of resolution of the 5th instant of the Senate of the United States, directing the Secretary of War to inform the Senate "whether or not the Kansas City and Memphis Railway and Bridge Company, authorized by act of Congress approved April 24, 1888, to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River at Memphis, Tenn., have complied with that portion of said act which required such company to provide for a passageway for wagons and vehicles of all kinds and the transit of animals."

In answer to reference of the resolution to this office for report, I have to submit the accompanying copy of letter of the 18th instant, with inclosed sketch, from Capt. S. W. Roessler, Corps of Engineers, the officer directed to exercise supervision over construction of the bridge. This letter of Capt. Roessler contains the latest advices in this office respecting the bridge at Memphis, and will, it is believed, furnish the information desired by the Senate. It appears that the bridge is being constructed in accordance with the plan approved by the Secretary of War.

The resolution of the Senate is herewith returned.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

THOS. LINCOLN CASEY,
Brig. Gen., Chief of Engineers.

Hon. S. B. ELKINS, Secretary of War.

REPORT OF CAPT. S. W. ROESSLER, CORPS OF ENGINEERS.
UNITED STATES ENGINEER OFFICE,
Memphis, Tenn., April 18, 1892.

GENERAL: I have the honor to report as follows in reply to the following resolution of the Senate, dated April 5, 1892:

"Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to inform the Senate whether or not the Kansas City and Memphis Railway and Bridge Company, authorized by act of Congress approved April 24, 1888, to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River at Memphis, Tenn., have complied with that portion of said act which required such company to provide for a passageway for wagons and vehicles of all kinds and the transit of animals."

In the instrument of approval by the Secretary of War of the plan submitted by the bridge company the condition was imposed—

"That the Kansas City and Memphis Railway and Bridge Company shall provide an independent roadway for wagons and animals on such approach of said bridge, and for the entire length of the bridge proper, a roadway of sufficient width for wagons to pass each other without inconvenience, to be used by wagons and animals in common with the railroad."

As the main span of the bridge has not yet been completed and the roadway for wagons therefore not yet built, I construe the Senate inquiry to call for information as to the present plans of the bridge company regarding the wagon road. These plans, as explained to me, appear to conform to the above conditions.

An independent approach will be provided at each end of the bridge, joining the common roadway at points close to the shore piers, and the whole available width of the bridge proper, including the space between the rails, will be planked over for use as roadway. The width of the roadway across the bridge proper will be 18 feet 11½ inches, which will enable vehicles to pass without inconvenience.

I inclose herewith a sketch furnished by the engineer of the bridge showing section of proposed common roadway across the bridge proper.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

S. W. ROESSLER,
Captain of Engineers.

Brig. Gen. THOMAS L. CASEY,
Chief of Engineers U. S. A.

THE FINANCIAL SYSTEM.

Mr. COKE. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that tomorrow morning, after the routine business is closed, I shall ask permission to address the Senate very briefly on the silver resolutions lying on the table, introduced by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN].

TRANSFER OF REVENUE MARINE.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that a week from next Thursday I shall ask the Senate to consider the bill (S. 67) to transfer the Revenue Cutter Service from the Treasury Department to the Navy Department. I shall move to proceed to the consideration of the bill after the routine morning business on that day.

Mr. ALLISON. I shall not interfere with the Senator's notice except to say that when appropriation bills are ready I hope it will be understood that they shall take precedence of all other matters.

EXCLUSION OF CHINESE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In compliance with the unanimous consent of the Senate made upon the last legislative day, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6185) to absolutely prohibit the coming of Chinese persons into the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment reported to the bill by the Committee on Foreign Relations. Is the Senate ready for the question? Those in favor of the amendment will say "ay," contrary "no." [Putting the question.] The ayes seem to have it. The ayes have it, and the amendment is adopted.

Mr. PLATT. May the question be stated again?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the committee in the nature of a substitute for the House bill.

Mr. CULLOM. It is the Senate bill that is proposed as a substitute for the House bill, I understand. Is that right?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will restate the question. An amendment is proposed by the committee in the nature of a substitute for the House bill.

Mr. CULLOM. By the Committee on Foreign Relations of this body?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ought to say to the Senate that I understood from the general arrangement made the other evening that the vote should be taken upon this proposition, and that the amendment, if adopted, should be open to amendment.

Mr. PLATT. That is what I wanted to ask.

Mr. SHERMAN. The amendment, if adopted, is to be treated as the text of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That was the understanding of the Chair, that in the event the committee amendment should be adopted to the House bill that amendment would still be open to amendment, and in the event that the amendment proposed by the committee should be lost the House bill would be open to amendment by the Senate.

Mr. PLATT. That was all I desired to inquire about.

Mr. HARRIS. If the amendment shall be adopted, it stands as an original proposition, so that an amendment in the second degree will be admissible.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would so understand it.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand that the amendment has been adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did so decide, but will count it as no vote, and will again state the question. The question is on the adoption of the amendment reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. MITCHELL. No, sir. I took the floor on Saturday, but I consented when the bill came up to permit the Senator from Washington [Mr. SQUIRE] to go on this morning. He desires to address the Senate on this question before the vote is taken. He will be in the Senate in a moment. He has gone to get his papers.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suggest that until the Senator from Washington comes in the Calendar be called.

Mr. SQUIRE entered the Chamber.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the adoption of the substitute reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations, and the Senator from Washington will proceed.

Mr. SQUIRE. Mr. President, I desire to define my position as to this bill. I will first premise by referring briefly to my own convictions upon the general subject of the exclusion of the Chinese. When I first went to reside on the Pacific coast in 1879, like many another who has been educated in New York and New England, I was inclined to think there was too much prejudice against the Chinese, and perhaps persecution of them. I was inclined to take the humanitarian view and to believe that our country was so grand and so strong that it could safely withstand the friendly incursions of the people of China without danger to our civilization.

During my residence in the city of Seattle, between 1879 and 1884, I met a number of Chinese merchants who were engaged in legitimate business upon a somewhat extensive scale for the size of the place. I remember in particular the firm of Wa Chong as being one that was well thought of by the citizens of Seattle. The members of this firm owned their own real estate, and the city had let to them extensive contracts for street work which had been executed satisfactorily. I found the manager of this establishment to be an able and honorable business man; and by reason of meeting a few of this class of Chinese I had come to be very favorably disposed toward them.

I soon found, however, that there were a great many Chinese of a different order there, and on visiting the cities of Tacoma, Olympia, Portland, and San Francisco, I ascertained from personal observation that a very large portion of the Chinese on the Pacific coast are of a kind whose presence is deleterious to the best interests of society.

In the years 1884, 1885, 1886, and 1887, I happened to occupy the position of governor of the Territory of Washington, and during that time I had occasion to investigate this subject officially, by reason of the strong hostile feeling then prevailing in all those cities and places in the vicinity of Puget Sound. During a part of this time there had been an unusual depression in business in that country as a result of the great business failures of 1873.

The work upon the railroads of that country had been to a large degree suspended, and many of the laboring class were without employment. A profound feeling of dissatisfaction and unrest prevailed among the masses, and hostility against the Chinese was developed to a remarkable degree. Public meetings were held, at which heated discussions prevailed. The Chinese were attacked and driven from the mines and their habitations destroyed. In another instance they were driven from the hop yards in Squak Valley, where they had been given work; their tents were burned and several of them were killed. At another time they were driven out of Tacoma by an organized body of citizens, which the sheriff of the county and his posse could not control, and their dwellings were burned.

An attempt was also made to drive them out of the city of Seattle, where I happened to be at the time, but in consequence of the vigorous measures adopted, including the employment of the militia of the Territory and the subsequent support of United States troops, this attempt was unsuccessful. The President sent a regiment of United States troops there under Gen. Gibbon, commanding the department, and these troops remained in Seattle for several months in order to prevent further trouble. Every effort was made by me in four of the large counties to protect the Chinese, as it was my duty to do; and I have been given to understand that the Chinese Government was satisfied with the action of the United States Government in its endeavor to carry out the spirit and the letter of the treaty.

These trying events led me to understand, as I had never done before, the intense feeling of antagonism that is seated in the breasts of the great body of our laboring people in reference to the Chinese.

In my official report to the Government, dated October 1, 1886, I stated as follows:

The fact is not to be disguised that the people of the Pacific coast, with very few exceptions, possess a spirit of hostility toward the Chinese residents, and although a large proportion of our citizens entertain feelings of loyalty and patriotism toward the Government, yet in several large towns they are inclined to be lenient to those who engage in acts hostile to the Chinese, and this fact makes it extremely difficult to secure convictions of this class of offenders against the law.

This feeling has been greatly aggravated by the fact that notwithstanding the terms of the so-called restriction act large numbers of Chinese have continued to cross the border from British Columbia in defiance of the law, and though appeals have been made to the Government to employ sufficient force in the customs department to prevent such unlawful incursions by Chinese, it has been found that with the limited customs force at its disposal the Government is practically unable to enforce the exclusion of the Chinese under the terms of the law.

The letter of the Secretary of the Treasury (copy here inclosed), dated December 9, 1885, explicitly states that "the appropriation heretofore made by Congress for carrying out the requirements of said act is entirely exhausted, and that at present it is impracticable for the Department to take any measures other than those already taken to prevent the landing and entrance of unauthorized Chinese laborers in United States territory."

I may be permitted to urge the view which is naturally taken by American residents of the Pacific coast, that it is important to have that country settled by free American laborers, who have respect for the institutions and laws of our country, who will establish permanent homes, and who will rear their families and train their children to have proper respect for labor in even its humblest sphere.

The presence of Chinese in large numbers has heretofore been necessary, perhaps, in prosecuting works of great magnitude, like our transcontinental railways, at a time when no other laborers could be procured in sufficient numbers; and even now this class of labor is being used in the construction of the Cascade Branch of the Northern Pacific Railroad. But the hiving of hordes of Chinese in the towns is thought to interfere with the healthy growth and development of society, and is a constant source of uneasiness and dissatisfaction to the white laborer. Its effects are seen in bringing reproach upon certain kinds of humble but honorable occupation.

The Chinese rarely have families; they generally reside in disreputable quarters; they do not consider themselves permanent residents of our country; they live with as meager expenditure as possible and send their surplus earnings abroad to their own country.

In cases of interference with the rights of Chinese the courts have done all that was possible to protect them; and in compliance with the terms of the treaty, with your instructions, and with the request of the Secretary of State, I, as the executive of the Territory, have exerted every lawful power to insure their safety.

Mr. President, the fact is that I then became satisfied of the great injury to our own people from the presence of Chinese in any considerable numbers, and that to promote domestic tranquillity it was necessary that our Government adopt more vigorous measures than it had ever adopted then or has adopted since to enforce the exclusion of Chinese.

The first point I make is the inefficiency of our Government in carrying out the provisions of the laws which have already been enacted. Every year since 1884 the attention of the Government has been called to the inadequacy of the customs force on the northern frontier for the enforcement of the acts for the restriction of Chinese immigration.

During this time the facilities for the introduction of Chinese have been largely increased by reason of the establishment of a regular line of steamers between China and British Columbia, and by the opening of railroads and other avenues of travel on land between British Columbia and the United States; yet the customs force in the collection districts along the northern frontier has not been perceptibly increased, and the reason for this failure to increase the customs force is alleged to be, and undoubtedly is, the lack of money which should have been appropriated for the purpose.

I have no sympathy with demagoguery in any form, and it seems to be demagoguery of the most arrant kind for the representatives of the United States in Congress assembled to inveigh against Chinese, and to pass act after act for the alleged purpose of their exclusion from this country, when at the same time that Congress fails to provide a reasonable sum of money to enable the law to be efficiently executed.

The same relative conditions that prevailed several years ago prevail now; and all this talk about increasing the stringency of the provisions is nonsense unless Congress will provide the necessary money to increase the customs force along the frontier and to purchase steam launches for the interception of boats that are engaged in running Chinese into the United States by way of the Straits of Fuca and Puget Sound. I believe the Government has authorized the construction of one steam vessel for that purpose, but up to this time no such vessel is in service, although so urgently needed.

Mr. Charles B. Woods, special deputy collector for the district of Puget Sound, says, on page 64 of the report of the special committee on Chinese immigration, in answer to the question:

How many are there of them [inspectors]?

There are about twelve inspectors.

Q. Have you enough force to effect the carrying out of these laws?

A. No, sir; not half enough, not one-third enough.

Q. How many men would you require?

A. Well, we could use sixty people very nicely in this district and keep them busy all the time. I think we have thirty-six here now, including the collector and all.

Mr. DAWES. When was the testimony taken?

Mr. SQUIRE. This testimony was taken in the latter part of the month of November and the first part of December, 1890.

Q. And you think you could use sixty people altogether?

A. Yes, sir; that would make twenty-four more inspectors we would have.

I read from the report of the supervising special agent of the Treasury, dated November 7, 1891:

Until within the past few years the long line of frontier from Lake Superior to the Pacific Ocean needed but little watch-care, as the international boundary line ran through a region some hundred miles in width practically. Now all this is changed. Railways running parallel on both sides of the boundary line, intersected by other railways crossing the line, have brought with them population and constant communication between the two countries.

There are but four collection districts upon the northern frontier between the Lake of the Woods and the Pacific Ocean, a distance of about 1,400 miles, each district embracing a large territory, and the number of officers for preventive duty upon this long line of frontier does not exceed twenty, and the present customs appropriation will not admit of any material increase of this force.

The district of Puget Sound, comprising many islands within a few miles of British territory, with a long line of water front, furnishes facilities for smuggling and the clandestine introduction of Chinese, against which the customs officers have vainly contended.

Reference has been made by the honorable Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] to the fact that I was engaged as chairman of the subcommittee which was instructed by Congress to make the last Congressional investigation upon the Chinese question. While I was with this committee it took testimony in six cities, namely: Spokane, Port Townsend, Seattle, Tacoma, Portland, and San Francisco. The testimony of the collector of the district on the northern frontier and of all his subordinates who were summoned is conclusive as to the point that there is not anything like sufficient force there to carry out the provisions of the restriction act. The honorable Senator from New Hampshire has read such portions of the testimony as may be necessary to corroborate what I have stated.

There is also testimony to the fact that another law has been violated by the introduction of the Chinese on the northern frontier, namely, the alien contract-labor law.

The evidence of the deputy collector is that about 50 Chinese come into the United States by way of British Columbia each week, in violation of the restriction act. Since 1889 the British Columbian Government has charged $50 per head tax upon Chinese entering that country. The number of Chinese in British Columbia seems not to have increased.

It has been stated to me by a person high in official position in Victoria that there are about six thousand Chinese now in the province of British Columbia, of which about three thousand reside in the city of Victoria. They have some means of knowing the number of Chinese by reason of the imposition of the school tax of $3 per head annually, and the Chinese who are miners pay a tax of $5 annually to the government.

Thus it seems that the Government of British Columbia is making a nice little revenue out of this business; and the United States is the market. Of course the steamship lines from China to British Columbia get the benefit of the passage money. There seems to be established a regular business of transporting the Chinese from Victoria to the United States. This is shown on page 72 of the report, where Mr. Woods testifies as follows:

Q. Have you ever learned that white men have been engaged in bringing in these Chinese for hire?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Have been paid for bringing them into the United States?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Have you satisfactory evidence on that point that you know to be a fact?

A. Yes, sir; I think Judge Swan has bound over several lately.

Q. What has been done with those white men? Have they been punished in any way?

A. Yes, sir; they are up waiting for trial now; some of them have been sent up for nine months or a year.

Q. Did you ascertain what amount had been paid for bringing in Chinese that way?

A. They pay from $25 to $50 a head.

Q. Is it an established fact that there are men engaged in that business, a regular business?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you know the names of some of those men?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Where are they living?

A. In Victoria, British Columbia.

Q. Are they people of the United States, or do they belong to British Columbia?

A. Some of them are supposed to be American citizens.

Thus we see that our officers in this district are active and vigilant, but are unable to repress the traffic for lack of men and means.

Now let us turn to another principal branch of the inquiry, namely, the difficulties which are encountered at San Francisco, where we find that our officers not only have to contend with the natural difficulties of identifying the Chinese who endeavor to come in by fraud, but they have also to contend against regular agencies in China and San Francisco, organized for the purpose of evading the law. The evidence on this point by S. J. Ruddell, inspector of customs at San Francisco, is as follows:

Q. In regard to the operation of this exclusion act, what difficulties, if any, do you, or does the customs department, meet with in carrying out the provisions of that law?

A. The difficulty is in landing the Chinese under the writ of habeas corpus by the United States courts.

Q. Describe that process.

A. Well, we understand it here, that a Chinaman who desires to come to this country can go to an agency in Hongkong and there, by depositing $170, he will receive a guaranty to be landed in San Francisco.

Q. Go to an agent in Hongkong?

A. Go to an agency in Hongkong. I believe there are several in Hongkong that take that contract.

Q. You mean men there who have connection with men here?

A. Yes, sir; there are agents in Hongkong and agents here. A man deposits $170, and his fare for the round trip is taken out of that, $52.

Q. Taken out of the $170?

A. Yes, sir; when the agency in Hongkong receives a sufficient number to send on a ship, they send an invoice to an agent here, and the agent here gets the witnesses and the bondsmen ready, and swears out writs of habeas corpus for the men on the steamers that they have never seen, that they are restrained of their liberty; either that the person on board is a merchant, and entitled to land here under the law, or is a native of the United States. Citizenship is the chief claim made by persons coming here now.

Q. Do you mean to say that these statements are fabricated and untrue?

A. I am positively certain of that.

Q. In every case?

A. In about ninety-nine cases out of a hundred.

Q. Ninety-nine per cent of those cases are fraudulent?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What do the courts decide about that?

A. I suppose they have to accept the testimony.

Q. What is the result of the investigation by the courts?
 A. The result is, in the circuit court for the eleven months just ended, 67 per cent of the cases tried have been remanded.
 Q. And the persons have been sent back?
 A. They have not been sent back, but have been ordered sent back by the courts.
 Q. That would be about two-thirds, then?
 A. Yes, sir. About 14 per cent have been ordered sent back in the district court. Of that number not more than 5 per cent have been actually sent to China. The others are either appealed or they are let out on bond. The bondsmen have failed to produce the petitioners, however, in a great many cases.
 Q. Are these bondsmen then sued?
 A. Not as far as I know.
 Q. How many of those who do land claim to be citizens?
 A. About 95 per cent of those who come here without proper credentials to land.
 Q. Ninety-five per cent?
 A. Yes, sir. Men come here, 27 years of age, who say that they lived here until they were 15 years of age, and then went back to China. They don't remember anything about the country; don't remember a single person living here; don't know the names of any people living here; never were on the streets; never saw any Chinese children living here. That is the class of men who come here claiming to be citizens.
 Q. Is there any feeling in this community, on the part of even the legal fraternity, or of the merchants, or of the laboring people, that this law is being evaded willfully and negligently on the part of the officers of the law?
 A. I don't know that it is being evaded except, as I say, these Chinese who are landed on writs of habeas corpus. Occasionally a Chinaman will come here claiming to be a merchant, and will have papers from the interior, or may be from San Francisco, and we find the papers are not genuine. In cases of that kind a man is refused landing, and he usually sues out a habeas corpus writ or his friends do it for him.

The honorable Senator from Montana [Mr. SANDERS] spoke scathingly and ably and I think justly a day or two ago in regard to what appeared to him to be great laxity on the part of the courts in California; but there is one point he seems not to have understood—the figures as stated in the report of the committee in regard to the number of men that have been taken off on writs of habeas corpus. He thought it strange and that the statement was incorrect that there were over 7,000 taken off on writs of habeas corpus during the year 1888, and that only 1,992 had been taken off on writs of habeas corpus since October 1, 1888.

I would explain to the Senator from Montana that this great difference, which amazed him, is due to the operation of the last exclusion act, which went into force October 1, 1888, as he will see on page 274 of the report.

I desire to call attention to the testimony of T. J. Phelps, collector of the port, in regard to the character of Mr. Ruddell, the witness whose testimony I have just quoted:

Q. You speak of Mr. Rickards and Mr. Ruddell. I wish you would state to the committee something in regard to the relation they bear to your office and to you in these matters.
 A. They are inspectors of customs assigned to this business. Mr. Rickards is specially appointed to this place as an interpreter; that is, he is assigned as an inspector. Mr. Ruddell is a regular inspector and assigned to this business.
 Q. You regard the statements made by these men to you from time to time as being perfectly credible and perfectly reliable?
 A. Entirely so; yes, sir.
 Q. And you believe this committee can regard their statements to the committee in the same way?
 A. Yes, sir; as far as Mr. Ruddell is concerned he talks from the record, and his statements are absolutely correct.

Again referring to the testimony of Mr. Phelps, I will call attention, briefly, to his statements on page 325:

As Judge McAllister has said, most of the men, the larger proportion of the men, coming now claim to be native born, because the result of a discharge of one of these men is to naturalize him. If the judgment of the court is that he is a native-born citizen, and that judgment is not appealed from, how is the fact thereafter to be disputed? I take it that the act of discharge of one claiming to be native born is in fact a naturalization of that individual if he is not a native born, and therefore it becomes a very serious matter as far as that class of business is concerned. It is not only the introduction of one more Chinaman into the United States, but it makes him a citizen, capable of exercising the elective franchise, and of holding office even of that of the President of the United States.

In another place (page 326) Mr. Phelps says that—

They (the Chinese) adopt new methods all the time. One of the methods they have been recently adopting is to claim to be merchants in out-of-the-way places and present papers signed by a greater or less number of white men stating that they were merchants and thinking that we would accept that rather than go to those places and make an investigation. Quite a large number of cases had accumulated where the parties claimed to be merchants in Stockton, Sacramento, and various places, and I think Oroville was one of the places. So I sent Mr. Rickards, when we had an opportunity to do so, to make an investigation of these cases, and he found in every single instance they were misrepresentations; there were none of them that were actual merchants.

John P. Carey, the United States attorney from November 29, 1886 to November 6, 1890, referring to habeas corpus cases where bail has been taken, says:

I have not prosecuted these cases because I think it a useless expenditure of time and money. Therefore I have practically abandoned them.

In another place he says:

I concluded that every one of these bondsmen where I have declined to institute civil suits are not the persons they represented themselves to be, and had nothing, and were fraudulent; that was my judgment.

He also says that since the exclusion act 70 to 75 per cent of the Chinese claim to be native born, and consequently citizens.

Before that act but 5 per cent made that claim; and he recommends that at least one white witness should be required to prove native birth.

I have read thus extensively from the testimony in order that the difficulties of carrying out the exclusion act may be properly understood and dealt with by the Senate.

The great question in San Francisco is that of identification. The best legal opinion in San Francisco, so far as ascertained by the committee, is that the present law will expire in 1892. So far as I can gather from expressions of those of the Senate who have investigated this legal question, the preponderance of opinion seems to be to the same effect. We may take it for granted, then, for the purposes of our action to-day, that it is needful to pass additional legislation immediately, at least so far as relates to the reenactment of the present law; but in so doing it seems to me that we can properly add other safeguards for the purpose of identification and for the avoidance of fraud, and to add punishment by imprisonment as a deterrent.

It is very doubtful that the Senate will agree to pass the House bill as it stands. I do not believe it is necessary to increase the number of classes of Chinese that shall be excluded; that is to say, I would be willing to admit merchants, visitors, and scholars, in addition to the diplomatic and consular representatives; but if it shall be found, after further safeguards are added for the proper identification of Chinese and the prevention of fraud, that it becomes necessary to enlarge the number of classes for the sake of securing the effectiveness of the law against the classes already excluded, then I might be willing to adopt a still more rigorous measure.

I might then go to the extent of preventing the Chinese from returning to this country at all, as proposed in the House bill; but I would only do it, if at all, for the purpose of excluding those Chinese who are already excluded by law. I am in accord with the honorable Senator from California [Mr. FELTON] in the statement he made to the Senate Thursday, which is as follows:

The only desire which controls us in the whole bill and amendments is simply to prevent the coming of those people under the present laws into the United States; that is all.

As I understand the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, which committee reported the amendment to the House bill, he desires a test vote on that amendment to-day. If this amendment be carried the bill will still be open to amendment in the Senate. With this understanding I shall vote for the present amendment, believing it to be the quickest way to arrive at legislation for the reenactment of the present laws, which reenactment is urgently needed, so that it may go into effect prior to the 6th day of May, 1892.

But I believe that, in the present bill, there should be ingrafted provisions for the registration of Chinese and for the issuance of a certificate, containing a true photograph of the applicant, to each of the Chinese now in this country, or who may hereafter come here, except those engaged in a diplomatic or consular capacity.

Mr. KENNA. Can one distinguish between the Chinese so as to identify them?

Mr. SQUIRE. Oh, certainly, one can learn to distinguish between Chinese just the same as between Africans.

I would not put any indignity upon the representatives of the Chinese Government. I would establish certain requisites to be observed in the proceedings of the courts with reference to the kind of bail to be given and the character of the bailor. In accordance with the recommendation of the district attorney at San Francisco, I would legislate that at least one white witness shall be required to prove native birth.

It may also be practicable to provide that no agent for any transportation line in the United States shall sell tickets or furnish transportation by any railroad, steamboat, stage line, or other vehicle to any Chinese who is not provided with a certificate as before mentioned. It may also be proper to define the word "merchant" and the word "traders" as applicable to the Chinese, in order to prevent fraud by reason of misrepresentations on that point.

I would not exclude any who are merchants in the proper sense of the term; but those laborers who, in preparing to depart from the United States for China, are in the habit of paying a small amount of money into some Chinese mercantile firm, so that they may pretend to be partners and merchants, for the purpose of evading the law, should not be allowed to take advantage of this false pretense to enable them to return to this country.

Much has been said about the value of our trade with China, and much, too, about the prospect of the breaking off of relations between our Government and the Government of China. Mr. President, the American people have already taken a great stand on this question, and one that redounds to our credit. The question of immigration—as to who shall hereafter be entitled to come from foreign countries to reside in the United States—is one that has not yet been fully worked out; there are likely to be other acts of exclusion placed upon our statute books.

That immigration which threatens the direct results of all, the immigration from China, has been measurably stopped. Think what the results would have been had there been no exclusion act of 1882, of 1884, and of 1888. Probably, instead of there being 200,000 or 300,000 Chinese in this country, we would have had by this time a million or more Chinese in our midst, with all of their demoralizing influences.

It is true that the Pacific coast has thus far felt the burden of this evil. The Pacific coast is being rapidly peopled by former citizens of the Eastern, Middle, Western, and Southern States. In many places the schools and churches and other institutions of society in the State of Washington remind one of the same class of institutions in the New England States. You have no right to imperil the society of that region of the Union, even though you do not feel the results yourselves.

As to trade, we on the Pacific coast are not limited to China. We have a great and growing trade with many other parts of the world, and thus far the greater part of the trade is with the countries along the Pacific coast of America, with Australia, Japan, and the islands of the Pacific, and with England; and when the Nicaragua Canal is completed we hope to supply the Atlantic coast of America with many productions, such as merchantable timber, which we have in vast quantities, and which it is not now profitable to ship around Cape Horn.

But I do not believe that the enactment of these proposed amendments will affect the diplomatic attitude of the Government of China any more than do the laws which have already been passed. That Government seems to have tacitly accepted the situation as it is now. I would do nothing which can justly aggravate it. There are at least a hundred times as many Chinese in the United States now as there are Americans in China—at least 200,000 Chinese here and not 2,000 Americans there. Only the treaty ports, twenty-four in number, I believe, are open to us and to England, unless a special permit be obtained to travel to the interior. In our country the Chinese can travel wherever they please and occupy a seat or a berth in a Pullman car alongside of you or me, as I have known in my own experience.

Trade is a matter of money-getting prompted by the self-interest or selfishness of the individual, firm, or company. Traders will trade where they can make the most money, and it is folly to suppose that the Chinese will miss the opportunity of continuing to sell us what they can, whether it be $19,000,000 worth of goods per annum, or a greater or less amount; and they will take from us that which they regard to be the best and the cheapest.

The people of the States of Washington and Oregon are engaged in shipping flour from their own mills to China, which flour goes in bond through Vancouver, in British Columbia, and we shall soon have our own direct line of steamers from Puget Sound to Hongkong, the great British port of China, from which the distribution of trade is largely made.

I say, then, stand up for American manhood and the institutions of our society; and let us not be cheated out of what we know to be right by any tempting seductions about possible future trade, which we are sure to get anyway, if we deserve it; but it would be better for us never to buy or sell another dollar's worth with the Chinese than that our people shall become vitiated and labor put in an unequal and demoralizing competition with such a class as Chinese laborers have proved themselves to be.

Let us be kind, just, and firm with the Chinese, as a nation and as a people. Let us encourage legitimate trade in every proper manner, but give the nations of the earth to understand that we take no step backward in the matter of citizenship. Our standard is not to be lower, but higher. America for Americans and for those who adopt our institutions, who assimilate with us and become a part of our great national fabric.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I desire to say a few words. Mr. PLATT. Will the Senator allow me to give notice of an amendment which I intend to propose to the pending bill?

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT. In case the substitute reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations should be adopted, I give notice that I shall move an amendment to it. I think it proper, perhaps, that I should give this notice in advance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator desire it read for information.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask that it may be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment intended to be proposed by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] will be read.

The SECRETARY. After the word "descent," in line 5 of section 1 of the amendment of the Committee on Foreign Relations, it is proposed to insert:

Excepting only the act approved October 1, 1888, entitled "An act a supplement to an act entitled 'An act to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese,' approved the 6th day of May, 1882."

Mr. PLATT. The effect of that amendment would be to extend the laws in force relating to the coming of persons from China, except the Scott act.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] was recognized by the Chair. Does he yield?

Mr. CHANDLER. I only desire to occupy about five minutes. Mr. MITCHELL. I had the floor and yielded to the Senator from Washington [Mr. SQUIRE].

Mr. CHANDLER. Then, certainly I do not insist upon the floor if the Senator wishes to proceed now.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think I shall have to go on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, it is not my intention to engage in any very lengthy discussion of the pending bill, but rather to give some of the reasons which will influence my vote on the several propositions before the Senate.

Much as I regret personally to antagonize what seems to be the result of the deliberate judgment of the distinguished Committee on Foreign Relations, I feel impelled by a sense of duty and by those opinions which I have entertained for many years, and which I have endeavored during the past seven years at all times to impress upon the Senate as best I could, to vote against the proposed substitute of the committee and in favor of the principle of absolute Chinese exclusion, as embraced in the bill as sent us by the House of Representatives.

I regret, however, that I am not inspired with any very well-grounded hope that anything I may be able to say at this time will be potential in preventing the adoption of the substitute proposed by the Committee on Foreign Relations. Should, therefore, the amendment of the committee be adopted, as now seems to be a foregone conclusion, and whether the Senate subsequently shall perfect that amendment or not so as to make it more acceptable to me, I shall give it my support, not because I believe it is that character of legislation which this Congress ought to enact on this important subject, not because I believe it is such legislation as the great masses of the people of the Pacific States and Territories, irrespective of party, desire and expect of this Congress at this time, but because it is infinitely better than nothing, and for the further reason that it is the very best, as I think, which a majority of the Senate is willing to accord, at least before a trial in conference.

I have listened with undivided attention and with considerable astonishment, I confess, to the very able and interesting speeches made by several of the members of the Committee on Foreign Relations, including the distinguished chairman of that committee [Mr. SHERMAN]. Those speeches, in my humble judgment, while able and interesting from their standpoint, were not the character of speeches, as I think, which the great masses of the people of the Pacific States and Territories, who have felt keenly the touch of the evils of Chinese immigration, would have desired to hear from members of that committee.

Those speeches were such as we might have expected to hear from Senators who, by conviction, had arrived at the conclusion that it is entirely wrong to impose any restriction whatever on the coming of Chinese to this country. They were speeches which would have sounded well and which would have been influential, it seems to me, in the highest degree had they been made in opposition to the first proposition ever presented to the Senate of the United States in favor of inhibiting, even to a limited extent, the coming of Chinese to this country. Those speeches, and especially the speech of the honorable chairman of the committee and that of my distinguished friend from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS], while able and interesting, presented arguments which, in my humble judgment, in view of the character of the amendment presented and advocated by that committee, and in view of the character of the legislation proposed by the House of Representatives, and which is antagonized by that committee, were fallacious and illogical.

Had the Committee on Foreign Relations desired, or did they desire now, to give expression by their acts to the full meaning of the sentiments expressed by them in those speeches, then it seems to me that there is but one way, and only one, to do that thing, and that is by a motion to recommit this bill to the committee with instructions to report a measure repealing all laws and treaties on the subject of restricting Chinese immigration, and reenacting in terms all the provisions of our original treaty with China of 1858 as modified by the Burlingame treaty of 1868. But if in this statement I am a little too harsh on the committee, or if my criticism is hypercritical, I certainly am justified in saying that if the instructions to which I refer should be modified so as to require a bill repealing the Scott exclusion act, then

I am sure I should not be chargeable with any unjust or unreasonable criticism of the action of the committee.

Why do I say that the arguments of the committee, in view of the proposition they support and in view of the proposition they antagonize, are illogical and fallacious? The main argument which has been made by these Senators in antagonism to the House bill is because it transgresses our treaty with China. That is the sum and substance of the argument. We are told we must keep faith, and it is insisted that the House proposition is a violation of faith, that it is Punic faith, that it violates, or, to speak more properly, contravenes, abrogates, repeals our treaty with China or certain provisions of it. Well, the very proposition proposed by the Committee on Foreign Relations as an amendment does the same thing. Therefore I say the arguments made against the House bill are illogical and fallacious.

What does the Committee on Foreign Relations propose as an amendment here? It proposes to extend for ten years all existing laws upon the subject of Chinese immigration. Now, then, let us see if the Scott exclusion act of October 1, 1888, which is proposed to be extended by the committee, is not in direct contravention of one of the most important provisions of our treaty with China of 1880. Article II of our treaty with China of 1880 provides as follows:

Chinese subjects, whether proceeding to the United States as teachers, students, merchants, or from curiosity, together with their body and household servants, and Chinese laborers who are now in the United States, shall be allowed to go and come of their own free will and accord, and shall be accorded all the rights, privileges, immunities, and exemptions which are accorded to the citizens and subjects of the most favored nation.

It will be observed that by the provisions of that treaty we solemnly agreed with China that not only Chinese subjects who were teachers, students, merchants, or others who might come to this country out of curiosity, but also the Chinese laborers in this country at the date of this treaty—the 5th day of October, 1880—should be allowed to do what?

To go and come of their own free will and accord, and shall be accorded all the rights, privileges, immunities, and exemptions which are accorded to the citizens and subjects of the most favored nation.

That is the treaty. What did the Scott exclusion act of October 1, 1888, which the committee propose to extend, say upon the subject? It is very brief and I will read it:

An act a supplement to an act entitled "An act to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese," approved the 6th day of May, 1882.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the passage of this act, it shall be unlawful for any Chinese laborer who shall at any time heretofore have been, or who may now or hereafter be, a resident within the United States, and who shall have departed, or shall depart therefrom, and shall not have returned before the passage of this act, to return to, or remain in, the United States.

There could not be a more direct and positive conflict between any two statements in any law or in any two laws than is presented by the conflict between the provisions of the second article of the treaty of 1880 and the provisions of the Scott exclusion act of October 1, 1888, yet that is one of the laws which the Committee on Foreign Relations present here as an amendment to the House bill. Then they come at us and the House of Representatives and at the country with the argument that we are violating a treaty with China. I say, then, that argument, in view of those facts, is illogical, is fallacious; it is an argument which ought not to have weight either with the Senate or with the country.

It is admitted, conceded here in the arguments of Senators, that the Scott act does contravene the treaty of 1880, but "it does not conflict with it quite as much," they say, "as the bill proposed by the House of Representatives, and, therefore, we are not the faith-breakers, but you, members of the House of Representatives and you Senators upon this floor who advocate the House bill are the faith-breakers who are not willing to keep faith with China; you are proposing to violate a treaty with China, and yet, in the very same breath they submit as an amendment a proposition which is equally bad, if anything can be bad which proposes to break down certain provisions of our treaty with China in order to protect our own people and our own institutions."

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator from Oregon permit me?

Mr. MITCHELL. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] has just offered an amendment which obviates the difficulty of which the Senator is complaining, and I hope he will vote for it.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am not surprised that there is an attempt at this late day to doctor up the amendment proposed by the Committee on Foreign Relations; I am not surprised at that at all. But the arguments which have been made on this floor in opposition to the House bill and in support of the committee's amendment—

Mr. BUTLER. Then I hope the Senator is satisfied.

Mr. MITCHELL. I shall have to be satisfied with whatever this committee does so far as that is concerned, because the edict has long since gone forth that the amendment proposed by the Committee on Foreign Relations must be adopted, and this, too, by an overwhelming majority in the Senate, hence nobody must think that I am talking with a hope of influencing the defeat of that amendment. I know too well the present situation in the Senate not to be aware of that.

Mr. ALLEN. I wish to make an inquiry of the Senator. I ask if the ground which he takes is not that a violation of the treaty in the case of a hundred or a thousand Chinamen who have the right to come here under that treaty is just as flagrant as if the number were greater; in other words, it is a matter of principle and not of number?

Mr. MITCHELL. Most assuredly. It is a matter of principle, certainly, and not a question as to the degree or extent to which the conflict exists.

We should be willing to do one of two things, it seems to me. As the Congress of the United States we should either be willing to keep perfect faith with China in reference to each and every provision of every treaty we have with that nation; or, if we are willing to go one step in the abrogation of the provisions of any one of those treaties for the purpose of protecting our own interests in this country against Chinese immigration, we should be willing to take all the necessary steps in order to make our legislation effective. That is my position. This I think the bill of the House of Representatives does, and I think the existing legislation does not.

Mr. PLATT. There are a great many of us here who feel that it is unnecessary to go to the length which the House bill goes.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is true. That is a matter of judgment and of determination for each Senator of course. I am perfectly aware of the differences of opinion as to what is absolutely necessary to be done in order to put an end to what each of the two great political parties in this country has been denouncing as a great national evil for years and years gone by. There is not a Senator upon this floor to-day of either party, I take it, who is willing to get up—perhaps there may be one or two—and say that the immigration of Chinese to this country is not a great evil, a threatening evil, a danger which imperils our institutions and leads to demoralization, and which ought to be checked if we as a great nation have the power to check it.

But I desire to say a word as to the power of Congress to abrogate treaties; and yet it ought not to be expected at this late day that anything should be said in support of the power of Congress to abrogate a treaty, and it is not necessary, I take it, in so far as any member of the Senate is concerned, although it was necessary here in the Senate no longer than five or six years ago, when any number of Senators, to my certain knowledge, took the ground that Congress had no power by an act of Congress to abrogate the provisions of a treaty, but I believe now all agree that the power exists clearly. But the Eastern press of the country, or a great portion of the Eastern press of the country, to-day is antagonizing the House bill; and one of the grounds urged by that press is because, it is alleged, Congress has no power to abrogate a treaty.

Mr. GRAY. If the Senator will allow me, that matter was settled a long while ago. In a great debate twenty-five years ago Mr. Sumner made a speech on that question and demonstrated it. It was accepted at the time, and I never knew that it had been controverted since.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is true. It has been settled, not only once, as the Senator states, but over and over again by this very Senate, composed, perhaps, not all of the same members that compose the Senate now. The Senate and the House no longer ago than in the Forty-fifth Congress, by a direct vote, abrogated, so far as Congress without the approval of the President could abrogate, the treaty of 1868, the Burlingame treaty, and I have the vote on that proposition now before me.

I will read the vote to the Senate. That, remember, was a direct vote submitted in the House of Representatives to repeal the Burlingame treaty in so many words, to abrogate it, to set it aside. It was not coupled with any other legislation. It passed the House by a vote of 155 yeas to 72 nays, 61 not voting. It passed the Senate by 39 yeas to 27 nays. I will read the yeas, commencing with my friend who sits right in front of me, the Senator from Iowa:

Allison, Bailey, Bayard, Beck, Blaine, Booth, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Coke, Dennis, Dorsey, Eaton, Eustis, Garland, Gordon, Grover, Hereford, Jones of Nevada, Kirkwood, Lamar, McDonald, McPherson, Maxey, Mitchell, Morgan, Oglesby, Paddock, Patterson, Plumb, Ransom, Sargent, Sanders, Sharon, Shields, Spencer, Teller, Thurman, Voorhees, Wallace, Windom.

Then you have thirty-nine Senators, who, with one exception, were all prominent Senators of the United States, who voted in the Forty-fifth Congress on a direct vote to abrogate the Burlingame treaty. Then we hear talk about bad faith.

Mr. PLATT. What became of the bill?

Mr. MITCHELL. It was not signed by the President.

Mr. ALLISON. Who was the "one exception" the Senator referred to?

Mr. MITCHELL. The one exception was myself. [Laughter.]

Mr. GRAY. Did you vote for it?

Mr. MITCHELL. I did. I say they were all with one exception prominent Senators [laughter], leading Senators, headed by such men as my friend from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], the present Secretary of State, Mr. Blaine, and the old Roman, Thurman—such men voted here on a direct vote to abrogate the very treaty which we hear so much talk about now by the distinguished Committee on Foreign Relations as to not keeping faith and all that kind of—as it seems to me—nonsense at this late day. Why, I should suppose if there was any one thing settled better than another, it is that the people of this country, irrespective of party, had come to the conclusion that Chinese immigration to this country was a great evil which ought to be put an end to.

We either believed that or we have been demagoging in our primaries, in our political conventions in States, in our Legislatures, and in our national conventions, and I take it for granted that no party would do that, and certainly the Republican party would not do it, as is suggested to me by my friend from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

Mr. GRAY. I will ask the Senator if that was before the treaty of 1880?

Mr. MITCHELL. Oh, yes; certainly. Both before and since.

Mr. GRAY. Since the abrogation of the Burlingame treaty another treaty has been made, which very largely alters the condition of things existing at the time that was made.

Mr. MITCHELL. As a matter of course, but I am trying to maintain the proposition with which I started out, that the arguments of the members of the Committee on Foreign Relations are illogical. And also that all this talk about abrogating treaties, this fear that we shall do something to excite the displeasure of China, and which will bring down upon the head of this nation the condemnation of the Chinese Emperor, has no real grounds of support. We are told that if we abrogate a treaty the Chinese will break off trade with us. Why did they not declare non-intercourse when both Houses of Congress, by a large majority, on a direct vote in the Forty-fifth Congress abrogated the Burlingame treaty, so far as they could abrogate it without the consent of the President? Why did not China then withdraw her minister and cause a cessation of trade, and declare nonintercourse? She did nothing of the kind. Her interests in the trade of this country being threefold to ours will prevent her, as it did then, from breaking off relations with us simply because we exercise our rightful sovereign power to protect our own interests, our people, and our institutions against what we regard as a great evil.

Not only so, but let me call attention to the fact that in our revenue laws we not only once and twice and thrice, but time and again have directly contravened the provisions of the treaties which we have had with foreign nations.

We had a treaty with Denmark in 1857, which provided, among other things, as follows:

No higher or other duties shall be imposed on the importation into the United States of any article, the produce or manufacture of the dominion of the treaty-making power, than are or should be payable on like articles, being the produce or manufacture of any other foreign country.

There was a solemn provision in our treaty of 1857 with Denmark, and yet in 1875 what did we do by a treaty? In 1875 the United States entered into a treaty with the Hawaiian Islands by which certain products were admitted free of duty. This treaty received the approbation of Congress, and it was insisted upon the part of the exporters in Denmark that by virtue of the provision in the Hawaiian treaty similar products to those admitted under the Hawaiian treaty should come in free of duty, but the circuit court for the southern district of New York held as follows:

The stipulation in a treaty with a foreign power to the effect that no higher or other duties shall be imposed on the importation into the United States of any article the produce or manufacture of the dominion of the treaty-making power than are or shall be payable on the like articles the produce or manufacture of any other foreign country does not prevent Congress from passing an act exempting from duty like products and manufactures imported from any particular foreign dominion it may see fit.

We have treaties to-day with the Two Sicilies, with Portugal, with Hayti, with Honduras, with Nicaragua, and Italy, if they have not been terminated recently, in which there is a like provision as in our treaty with Denmark, and yet we by our tariff laws have come in direct conflict with that provision time and time again; but we hear no protest from our friends from the East against abrogating treaties when the tariff is involved. Time and again, as the records of Congress will show, have you passed revenue laws which conflicted directly and emphatically with this provision in the treaty with Denmark, the Two Sicilies, Portugal, Nicaragua, Honduras, Hayti, and Italy. That can all be done and no protest is made, but when we of the West come here and say that in order to protect our people and our institutions, as well also as the people of the whole country, it becomes necessary to set aside certain provisions of a treaty with China which we can not get rid of in any other way, then our friends from the East say we are violating the treaty, we are transgressing solemn treaty stipulations which we have with China, and it will not do.

The arguments of our friends against the House bill moreover proceed upon the assumption that this is a new proposition which has been suddenly sprung upon the country by the House of Representatives; that it is a strange and a wild proposition, something that has never before been brought to the attention of the country, that has never been considered, and therefore for that reason they are against it.

The House bill in all its essential features has been considered carefully and deliberately by the people of the Pacific coast, and it was indorsed by the press and the people of that section of our country almost unanimously over six years ago. This House bill is word for word in its main restrictive features taken from a bill I myself introduced in the Senate on the 11th day of February, 1886, and a copy of which I now hold in my hand.

With one or two verbal changes, so far as the restrictive clauses are concerned, it is this bill. I introduced the bill, as I said, February 11, 1886. In fact, the bill that I introduced is stronger in its repressive qualities than is the House bill, from the fact that the bill does not contain a provision the House bill does, that the Secretary of the Treasury may make certain regulations so as to permit certain persons who desire to visit this country to come here. The bill introduced by myself did not contain that provision, and yet when that bill was introduced in 1886 providing for absolute exclusion of all Chinese persons, excepting only diplomatic representatives, was forwarded to the Pacific coast and published in the papers, it received, as I said, the almost unanimous indorsement not only of the press but of the people in conventions and in State Legislatures. If I had time I should like to read a few of the indorsements of the bill. I will read one article, from the San Francisco Daily Evening Bulletin. It reads as follows:

If Senator MITCHELL's bill, with some modifications, or any other bill having a like purpose in view, can be passed, the Chinese question will be solved for all time. That bill rises fully to the gravity of the case. If the question of our relations with China were broadly and ably presented, there is not much doubt that his proposition will become the law of the land. Mr. Morrow's bill was introduced early in the session. It went as far as it was thought it was possible to go at that time. But since then the Chinese question has undergone an entire change on the Pacific coast. One whole stage in the national process of its solution has been jumped over. There was no one who favored Morrow's bill who did not know that at some future time some other and more ultra measure would have to be adopted. By the fact of the people in every city and town of importance on the whole coast the question has been advanced one step on the calendar, so to speak.

Revolutions never go backward. A social, moral, industrial, hygienic, financial, and ethnological revolution is now in progress in California and the other States and Territories of the Pacific. The general and, in many respects, lawful uprising of our people has stripped the question of the falsehoods by which it was surrounded. It is not the revolt of one class against another, however justifiable, but of a unanimous people determined to prevent the further defilement of this fair land by a heathen horde. It is Americanism asserting itself against the debased and servile Mongolism of Asia. For the time being the Pacific coast is fighting on the forefront of civilization. The movement is one which will occupy a greater space in history than the small souls who are now seeking to dwarf or divert it for gain imagine possible. It will rank second in the great moral and philanthropic movements of the epoch. The overthrow of black slavery was the first. The extinction of the more subtle coolism of the present day is the second.

Senator MITCHELL's bill is necessarily more in accord with the rising tide of popular determination to extirpate the Chinese evil once for all than any previous measure. There ought, in the present condition of things, to be no trouble about accepting it. There is no reciprocity at all in our dealings with China. We have received no reciprocal advantages. The case can be summed up in a few words: We enjoy no more rights in China than any other civilized nation, but our country alone has been opened up for the traffic of the man-dealers of Canton. That traffic is openly carried on with Cuba, Brazil, and Asia, and is sanctioned by treaty. Here it is cloaked and disguised because our laws forbid forced labor. Some people do not believe that the Chinese are held to service and labor in the United States because they do not see them driven about in gangs.

The chains which bind these slaves are invisible. They were forged out of their religion and their civil polity. The relatives of the Chinese peon are mortgaged at his home for the faithful performance of his contract. If he fail they are sold into slavery. He goes about apparently as a freeman, but his acts show the collar on his neck. Expensive lawyers are hired to represent coolies in the efforts to evade the restriction law, but in nothing else. Coolies move in obedience to orders issued by a central authority. They can not leave the country without the permission of their owners. If they attempt to do so they are removed from the steamer under trumped-up charges of felony. By cutting the Gordian knot as proposed by Senator MITCHELL we bring this slave incursion to an end. There is no reason to believe that such a summary method of proceeding will result in commercial loss of any kind.

That is what a leading and influential San Francisco paper says as to this House bill, which is the same identical bill introduced by myself so far as the exclusion provision is concerned—

There is no reason to believe that such a summary method of proceeding will result in commercial loss of any kind. Even if it did, every consideration of patriotism, morals, philanthropy, and civilization would require that the sacrifice should be made. But China has too good a thing in the trade with the United States to relinquish it. Besides, we are masters of the situation. By discriminating duties on tea and silk we can build up Japan at the expense of China.

Nor is there any necessity for diplomatic delay. No nation is bound to continue a treaty that is working it a constant and manifest injury. Great Britain did not ask permission when it modified by act of Parliament the extradition treaty which it had with us. It was enough for it that, in its opinion, that treaty was doing violence to some of the principles upon which its government was founded. No permanent, satisfactory arrangement can be made whereby certain classes of a people of whom we know but little, and of whose language we are all ignorant, are to be admitted and certain others excluded. The exigencies of the Burlingame treaty, when the object was to adhere to the letter of that one-sided document, required that some such arrangement should be set up, but for the reasons stated it can never be made to work. There will always be fraud and imposition in the administration of any law of that kind. It is by far preferable that an end should be made of the whole business right off. The Chinese can not be admitted to this country. There are millions of them standing ready to overwhelm us if the gates are not finally and firmly shut.

Similar articles, which I will ask the privilege of inserting in my speech if there is no objection, were published in all the leading journals of San Francisco and of the coast—in the San Francisco Chronicle, the Morning Call, the Evening Post, and also a very strong article at that time was published in the Philadelphia Press, having special reference to this very bill, in which it came out and took strong ground for the absolute exclusion of Chinese from this country.

The San Francisco Evening Post, in referring to the introduction of the bill, spoke editorially as follows:

THE MITCHELL BILL.

Senator MITCHELL of Oregon has introduced a Chinese bill of a much more thorough character than any that has yet been offered by a responsible statesman. It abrogates all existing treaties with China, so far as they hamper the United States in dealing with immigration; forbids the entry of any Chinese persons except government officials and their servants; provides punishment for any master of a vessel who brings Chinese in violation of the law; prohibits the naturalization of Chinese, and makes due provision for the execution of the act. No chance is left for the courts to nullify the law. The prohibition of immigration, with the one exception named, is absolute. In express terms, it applies to all persons of Chinese race, whether subjects of the Chinese Empire or not. The amiable witness, who appears with mechanical regularity to swear that the petitioner once lived on "Dupont street," would, under this measure, find his occupation gone, for previous residence is not recognized by the bill.

As to the justice of this proposed act there can not be two opinions on the Pacific coast. It is precisely what the Post has been recommending for months, and what will have to come, sooner or later.

The Daily Evening Bulletin of the same issue said, among other things in its leading editorial, the following:

SENATOR MITCHELL'S PROPOSITION.

Senator MITCHELL of Oregon has introduced a bill in the Senate to abrogate all treaties which give the Chinese the right to enter this country and then effectually exclude them. There is not much doubt but that is a step which will have to be taken sooner or later. The movement against the coolies which is now so general throughout the Pacific coast goes by different names. As a matter of fact it is merely a popular effort more determined than anything that has yet been attempted to shake off Mongolianism. Its object is nothing more than the full and complete re-Americanization of the Pacific States and Territories, which are about the only areas not well filled up in the United States at this time.

It might as well be understood by all those who gave any thought to the subject, East or West, that this movement is not going to come to a halt, or that there is not going to be a reaction of any consequence. The conflict is as irrepressible as that between free and slave labor formerly in the South. It will proceed until the only logical solution possible under the circumstances is reached—that is to say, the absolute, complete, and eternal exclusion of the servile and disturbing Chinese element. If there is not legislation wise and broad to facilitate and guide the movement, it will, before long, assume another more ultra and less manageable form.

To Senator MITCHELL's proposition, therefore, Congress will in time have to come. No doubt the wisest thing to do is to accept and enforce it now.

The San Francisco Morning Call said editorially in reference to this question and this particular measure:

MITCHELL'S ANTI-CHINESE BILL.

Senator MITCHELL has begun where other anti-Chinese legislators will end. The present Congress may not be prepared for the bill Mr. MITCHELL has presented, but the next Congress will be. The people of the United States appear to have made up their minds that Chinese immigration must be stopped, the only question now being as to the necessity of an act of legislation which abrogates existing treaties. The Mitchell bill will be opposed in Congress on the ground that it is a discourtesy to the State Department to give notice of the abrogation of a treaty through Congressional action. It will be held by some that the State Department should exhaust diplomatic resources in the effort to obtain such a treaty as we want before Congress shall declare a treaty abrogated. It seems to us, however, that time enough has been wasted in waiting for the State Department to act. There is much reason to doubt if that Department is intensely interested in keeping Chinese out of the country. It is certain that the Treasury Department has construed the present law to admit Chinese in transit without assuming the duty of ascertaining if the Chinese so admitted left the country as they reported their intention to do.

In various ways the Departments have done much to render the present law ineffective. There is some excuse, in consequence, if Congress, representing the people, takes the task of getting rid of Chinese into its own hands. Nine years ago, in the early part of Mr. Hayes's administration, an exclusion law was passed which did not pretend to conform to existing treaties. The President vetoed it on the ground that it would be discourteous to China to announce through Congress the abrogation of a treaty. Under the stimulant of this Congressional act the State Department set its intellectual forces at work, and in the course of time the treaty of 1880 was agreed upon. By that treaty we agreed to allow all Chinese then in the country to go and come at pleasure. The go-and-come clause in the treaty has proved fatal to its usefulness. The "go" was all right, but the "come" was a mistake. Senator MITCHELL's bill eliminates the word "come" wherever it occurs. The facilities for going are not in the least impaired, but we do not want any one Chinaman to go but once. The Call has frequently expressed the belief that the present act might be made effective by literal construction and rigid enforcement.

But the courts say that literal construction violates the spirit of the treaty. Rather than violate the spirit of the treaty the courts have so construed the act that it serves but little purpose. It increases the cost of landing Chinese in the country, but it does not apparently materially diminish the number landed. Now, if we must disregard the treaty, let us do so in an open and manly way. Let us say to the Chinese Government that on and after a certain date no Chinese laborers will be allowed to land in the United States. The stupendous folly of permitting a Chinaman to return and repeat his raid should be openly renounced. Provisions can be made for the migration of recognized merchants whose business requires an occasional trip to China. But when a Chinese laborer goes he should be denied the privilege to return. The Call favors all legislation which will strengthen the present law. If the Morrow bill can be passed and the Mitchell bill can not, let us have the Morrow bill. If it does not work better than the present law, Congress will be ready for the Mitchell bill before its fiftieth session expires.

The Call, in another editorial, said:

MAKE IT TIGHT.

A Washington dispatch says it is thought that all the anti-Chinese legislation the Pacific coast desires will be conceded by Congress. The anti-Chinese legislation which the Pacific coast especially desires is an enactment which will keep Chinese out of the country. Our experience convinces us that this can only be done by the enactment of a law forbidding Chinese laborers to return at all. When they go let them stay. So long as we undertake to provide for the return of the Chinese laborers, so long will fresh Chinese be sent in the place of those departed. We do not ignore the provision in the last treaty which allows Chinese then in the country to go and come of their own accord. It is, however, within the constitutional power of Congress to notify the Chinese Government that this provision of the treaty can not be observed without abandonment of the purpose for which the treaty was made.

We have tried during four years a restriction law which carefully observed the provisions of the treaty. Between Department decisions and judicial decisions, all intended to carry out the spirit as well as the letter of the treaty, this law has been made ineffective. We now want a law that can not be construed away. The bill Representative Morrow has introduced limits the time within which a Chinese laborer may remain in China without forfeiting the right to return to two years. This is a disregard of the treaty, which makes no limit at all. An air-tight and water-proof Chinese exclusion law is what the Pacific coast now desires.

The Chronicle, in discussing the pending bill editorially, said:

He [MITCHELL] has gone further than the most strenuous opponents of the Chinese have thus far gone, but it is just as well for Congress to face it now. MITCHELL will doubtless furnish reasons to justify the legislation he proposes, and show that the trade with China is not worth considering.

There is another point I wish to call to the attention of my friends who advocate the amendment of the committee, the members of that committee, and especially of my friend from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS], who, in his interesting speech, spent considerable time upon the point. I desired at the time to interrupt him to ask him the question, but I did not have an opportunity. I desired to ask the Senator from Minnesota whether it would make any difference to him in proceeding to enact a law that would come in contravention with the provisions of a treaty, provided it was made apparent to him in advance that the other party had been violating—not abrogating, but had been violating the provisions of that same treaty time and time again and continually? That is this case, Mr. President. I assert here, and I assert it on the very highest authority, I assert it upon the authority of three of the most eminent Federal judges of the Pacific coast, I assert it upon the authority of Mr. Justice Field of the Supreme Court of the United States, upon the authority of the late Lorenzo Sawyer, United States circuit judge for the ninth circuit, and upon the authority of the late Ogden Hoffman, United States district judge for the district of California.

Mr. KENNA. Does the Senator mean that they held the Chinese violated the treaty?

Mr. MITCHELL. The assertion is that the Chinese Government prior to any attempt upon our part to abrogate or repeal any of the provisions of our treaty with China, time and again and repeatedly violated certain provisions of that treaty, which is infinitely worse upon the part of any nation than to abrogate it or repeal it.

Mr. PLATT. What were the violated provisions?

Mr. MITCHELL. I will show the Senator what they are, and what the judges said on the subject and what Secretary Bayard said. I will read what Mr. Justice Field stated in the case of Chew Heong vs. The United States (112 U. S. Reports, page 567). Said he:

No American citizen can enjoy in China, except at certain designated ports, any valuable privileges, immunities, or exceptions. He can trade at those ports, but nowhere else. He can not go into the interior of the country and buy or sell there or engage in manufactures of any kind. A residence there would be unsafe, and the crowded millions of her people render it impossible for him to engage in any business of any kind among them. * * * Reciprocity in benefits between the two countries in that respect has never existed. There is not, and never has been, any "mutual" advantage in the migration or emigration of the citizens or subjects, respectively, from one country to the other, which the treaty, in cordially recognizing, assumes to exist.

Mr. PLATT. That has reference to the treaty of 1868?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, by the Burlingame treaty everything in the shape of emigration, except that which was entirely voluntary, was denounced and reprobated. I will read what Mr. Justice Field said in the case first referred to. By the provisions of that treaty the Chinese Empire covenanted to pass laws making it a penal offense for a citizen of the United States or Chinese subject to take Chinese subjects to the United States without their free and voluntary consent. That is one of the provisions of the treaty. Now, what does Justice Field say after citing that provision? He says in the case referred to, in 112 United States Reports, page 567:

In the face of this explicit provision large numbers of them, more than one-half of all who have come to the United States, have been brought under what is termed the contract system; that is, a contract for their labor. In one sense they come freely, because they come pursuant to contract, but they are not the free immigrants whose coming the treaty contemplates, and for whose protection the treaty provides. They are for the time the bond-slaves of the contractor—his cooly slaves. The United States had already legislated to prevent the transportation by their citizens of coolies from China to any foreign port; but no law has ever been passed by China to prevent its subjects, thus bound, from being taken to the United States.

Now, Mr. President, according to this declaration of this eminent judge, in an opinion delivered from the bench of the Supreme Court of the United States, China had continually violated her treaty with us; and yet we are told we are acting hastily and in bad faith, and we are implored to not affront China, and we must not do anything to agitate the Chinese authorities, lest we cause them to break off our friendly relations, and thus destroy our trade with them.

But not only so, I call attention to a letter of Secretary Bayard to the then President of the United States, transmitting the treaty of 1888 entered into between this Government and the Government of China bearing upon this same question, as to whether China had violated the provisions of our treaties. The letter is dated December 28, 1887, from Mr. Bayard to Mr. Chang Yen Hoon, then minister from China to the United States. He says:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, December 28, 1887.

SIR: I am constrained in the interests of that international comity which we both desire so fully to promote and sustain, to attract your excellency's attention to certain late disclosures in the course of judicial proceedings at San Francisco, in which certain Chinese subjects were arraigned for violation of existing laws of the United States relative to the restriction of the immigration of the Chinese laborers, passed for the enforcement of the existing treaties with China.

From the published letters of the judges and the public report of the proceedings in these trials the facts seem to be established that a systematic evasion of the restriction upon the immigration of Chinese laborers, imposed by laws passed in pursuance of the treaties, has been and continues to be practiced by Chinese professing to have gone away from the United States and claiming the right to return hither under the provisions of the treaty.

The details of these disclosures are shocking and unnecessary for repetition in this correspondence. Suffice it to say that an extensive traffic in immorality of the grossest nature, by which Chinese women are imported into the United States and brought and sold into infamy by their own countrymen, is clearly proven to have been carried on.

Then further he says:

The systematic violation of the treaty of 1880, and of the restrictive act of the United States passed in 1882, was averred by the eminent judge (Hoffman), before whom part of the cases were tried, and were also stated by another judge (Sawyer) in a published letter to the Hon. Mr. Morrow, M. C., dated November 21, 1887.

Here, then, we have the reported statement of these three eminent Federal judges that the violations of the treaty, not merely of the restriction acts, but violations of the treaty, were repeated.

Mr. GRAY. Will the Senator state, if he has it there conveniently for that purpose, what those evasions were of which the judge spoke?

Mr. MITCHELL. I stated that a moment ago.

Mr. GRAY. Of which Judge Hoffman spoke?

Mr. MITCHELL. That does not appear. It evidently relates to the labor-contract provision. It is violation of the treaty provision that they shall not bring persons to this country under contract, and that there had been a failure on the part of China to repress involuntary immigration, as that Government had covenanted to do in the treaty.

Mr. GRAY. That would be a violation of the Burlingame treaty, not of the treaty of 1880.

Mr. MITCHELL. That provision in the Burlingame treaty is not abrogated by the treaty of 1880 at all. It remains in force. It is part of the treaty to-day between this Government and China.

Mr. PLATT. As I understand it, the claimed violation was that China had failed to pass any laws to prohibit any involuntary emigration to the United States.

Mr. GRAY. Under article 5 of the Burlingame treaty.

Mr. MITCHELL. Which they had stipulated to do.

Mr. PLATT. They had not passed the laws which they had stipulated to do under article 5 of the Burlingame treaty?

Mr. KENNA. I understand the objection goes beyond that altogether; that they not only failed to pass laws, but not having passed laws, the very thing provided against by that section 5 was occurring.

Mr. MITCHELL. That it had been carried on presumably with their knowledge and consent, because it does not seem that there was any protest made or any steps taken by the Chinese Government or any representative of the Chinese Government to repress the illicit immigration or the horrors accompanying it that were shown up by judicial proceedings in San Francisco, until the attention of the minister from China—and I do not know that there was any taken then—was called to it by Secretary Bayard in his letter; and in the response made by the Chinese minister he admits virtually all that is charged. His response is in the same document.

Mr. PLATT. What is the document?

Mr. MITCHELL. Executive Document O, Part 2, Confidential, first session Fiftieth Congress. The seal of secrecy has been removed.

Mr. PLATT. On what page?

Mr. MITCHELL. Page 88. Chang Yen Hoon, in responding to this letter of Secretary Bayard, in referring to that part—

Mr. KENNA. Has the document been made public?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, it has been made public. It is no longer confidential, certainly not now. Minister Chang Yen Hoon, in responding to this letter of Secretary Bayard, said:

The shocking traffic in immorality alluded to in your note, by which Chinese women were imported into the United States and brought and sold into infamy by their own countrymen, is indeed detestable. I had heard of it previously.

So far from denying that these violations of the treaty were going on in a high-handed manner, he admits that it is so, and that he had heard of it before, and that it is "indeed detestable;" and yet we must be told here by members of the Committee on Foreign Relations that we must not proceed as we have the right and the power to proceed in our sovereign capacity as a nation to do whatever is necessary to be done to repress this great evil, even if it is to the extent of abrogating every provision of every treaty that ever existed between this country and China.

Mr. PLATT. I think the Senator ought also to read what the Chinese minister said a little further on.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, he says he had—repeatedly written to the viceroy and governor of Canton on the subject, requesting them to strictly charge the local authorities to make stringent efforts for the arrest and severe punishment of those who are guilty of the crime described.

But nothing was done to interrupt the illicit migration, nor was anything done by the Chinese Government to repress its accompanying horrors or mitigate their fearful consequences.

Mr. HISCOCK. Without any purpose of interrupting the Senator, I am curious to know what report from the Committee on Foreign Relations or what remark has been made by any member of the Committee on Foreign Relations that he can construe into the expression, "We are told that the Committee on Foreign Relations are opposed to the correction of this evil." He entirely misunderstands the position of the Committee on Foreign Relations. They are opposed to that and have presented a bill which will absolutely correct it; and he can not, run as swift as he can, outrun them in efforts to prevent it. The only thing that the Committee on Foreign Relations propose to do in correcting it is to correct it effectively; but under this cry against the Chinaman, under this thrashing over of old straw on this subject, they do not propose to go away beyond or be induced into going away beyond any necessities of the case in the legislation in respect of Chinese.

Mr. MITCHELL. I supposed the Senator from New York desired to ask a question, and instead of that he made a speech.

Mr. HISCOCK. I did desire to ask a question, as I have, and I desired to indulge in a practice which did not originate with me, but which I have seen followed by the Senator from Oregon, of right then at that point repudiating, so far as I may on the part of the Committee on Foreign Relations, the position on this question that he assigns to that committee.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Committee on Foreign Relations has presented a bill which simply extends existing laws.

Mr. HISCOCK. It does more than that.

Mr. MITCHELL. A little more—a very little more.

Mr. HISCOCK. A great deal more.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is about all there is to it. It is an extension of existing laws. I undertake to say to the Committee on Foreign Relations and to the distinguished Senator from New York that after an experience of nearly ten years on the part of the people of the Pacific coast, who have had to contend with this evil, they have come to the conclusion, I think almost unanimously, that the existing laws on the subject of Chinese restriction do not properly, fully, or in any respect completely meet the case. Furthermore, I supposed that the honorable Senator from New York, although he lives 3,000 miles away from the Pacific coast, knowing him to be the intelligent man and Senator that he is, taking in all that is being said and done in all parts of this great country, keeping pace with the record and public sentiment of the times, had been fully informed of that fact, and being so fully informed of that fact, and the committee generally being fully advised in the premises, I had hoped that instead of simply extending the existing laws they would have presented some more drastic measure.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to say, if the Senator will pardon me, that the Senator from New York—and I suppose he refers to me—had the honor of voting, as I said the other day, for the first anti-Chinese bill which passed Congress; and in respect to the evils that the Senator complains of, the Senator from New York is heartily and earnestly in sympathy with their correction and in favor of all the drastic measures that are necessary for their correction. Bear in mind, for their correction. The bill which has been reported here supplies an obvious defect in our present law, that it did not properly provide for the execution of the law now in force in respect to the deportation of the Chinese.

For that purpose a provision has been put in the bill, as I had occasion to say the other day, that must be absolutely efficacious for that purpose. What I object to is that when legislation of that kind is proposed, and by men who are just as anxious as the Senator from Oregon is to correct the precise evils complained of (and I do not stand in a rear line from him on that question) a false position is assigned to them.

Mr. MITCHELL. I certainly do not wish to assign a false position to the Senator from New York. I believe him; certainly am bound to after what he has just stated, but I believe he is mistaken in supposing existing legislation, even as modified by the committee, is an ample and complete remedy.

Mr. HISCOCK. Let me ask a question right here in respect to these Chinese women. How many are there of them in the United States?

Mr. MITCHELL. There are according to a recent investigation fifty-five houses of prostitution in the city of San Francisco where Chinese women are held under servile contract.

Mr. HISCOCK. No, no; how many Chinese women are there? I am not after the question of how many houses of prostitution there are in San Francisco. I am after the question of how many abandoned Chinese women there are in this country.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have not counted them, so far as I am concerned, nor am I for any reason able to answer the Senator's question.

Mr. HISCOCK. That is a more material question, so far as our legislation is concerned, than the fact of number of houses of prostitution, that there are in San Francisco under State law. Does the Senator know how many Chinese women there are?

Mr. MITCHELL. Perhaps the Senator from California [Mr. FELTON] can answer the question.

Mr. HISCOCK (to Mr. FELTON). How many?

Mr. FELTON. I do not know the number, but—

Mr. HISCOCK. I should like an estimate.

Mr. FELTON. I should like to inform the Senator—

Mr. HISCOCK. I should like an estimate of the Senator of the number.

Mr. FELTON. I should like to say to the Senator that every one of them there, possibly with a very few exceptions—I do not know of any—are there for that purpose and under contract for that purpose, and the contract was made before they left their own country.

Mr. HISCOCK. I grant it, but—

Mr. FELTON. The Senator has asked me a question, and I hope he will allow me to proceed. I do not know what the Senator meant by houses of that character under State laws. I will inform the Senator that we have no law for that purpose.

Mr. HISCOCK. I do not; I will say tolerated under State law and established by State law.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I decline to yield further.

Mr. FELTON. I object to that. We do not tolerate them under State law.

Mr. HISCOCK. I will say—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon declines to yield further, and he is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HISCOCK. Then I will withdraw the word "tolerated." I will say "existing in violation of State law."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MITCHELL. I hold in my hand the San Francisco Chronicle of Sunday April 17, 1892, one week ago, in which there are seven full columns showing the beauties of illicit Chinese immigration to this country, which I will loan to my friend from New York and have him read at his leisure without consuming my time further.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. President—

Mr. MITCHELL. I decline to yield further.

Mr. HISCOCK. The Senator addresses his remark to me. Let me reply.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon declines to yield, and will proceed without interruption.

Mr. MITCHELL. I say I will loan the newspaper at the proper time to my friend from New York, that he may be better informed on this subject than he is evidently at present. I will read a few lines for the edification of the Senator. The paper starts out as follows:

It is a sad commentary on the greatness of a nation when her laws are used as engines of assault against her constitution. Sadder still is the existence of such an anomaly when it not only imperils the well-being of the State, but strikes a blow at the very foundation of her social system. With the abolition of slavery through the terrible medium of the war of the rebellion there came into the minds of progressive American citizens a feeling of complacency somewhat akin to that of one who has laid aside disreputable garments and donned a new suit of clothes.

It is not pleasant, therefore, for Americans to be told that all who seek protection under the Stars and Stripes do not breathe the air of freedom; that slavery is not altogether a thing of the past, but that human beings are to-day bought and sold into a worse slavery than ever Uncle Tom knew of, and that the laws of our country are powerless to crush out the curse. It is still more unpleasant to our ears when we are told that our processes of law are constantly being invoked, and sometimes successfully, in aid of this nefarious traffic in human flesh, yet such is the truth, unpleasant though it be.

Dwellers in San Francisco have long ago pleaded guilty to some knowledge of the shameful commerce in Chinese women which has for years been carried on in their midst, and it has been one of their strongest arguments against the toleration of the race. But people who read of Chinatown only as a curious and quasi-picturesque element in the sights of a great city will no doubt be surprised to know that this blot upon the escutcheon of our civilization is as deep and dangerous as will here be shown.

The impression has gone abroad, and has found local lodgment, too, that Chinese girls are no longer sought after now for purposes of barter and sale, but the impression is not founded on fact. The Chronicle has taken pains to make a thorough investigation of the matter, and its readers are herewith presented with the facts in the case fresh from personal observation to date.

This is all in the past ten days, and here are disclosures that would put to shame some of the worst happenings under African slavery in this country in its palmy days. The article proceeds further as follows:

All things have a head, and organization is the order of our day and generation. The Chinese are known to be good organizers. Their secret societies have furnished many fatal proofs of their power. It will not, therefore, be surprising, though it will be a matter of news, to know that the brothel keepers, who are the bone and sinew of the Chinese slave traffic, are as thoroughly organized as the Sney Ong Tong or its rivals. It has been known, of course, that there was more or less collusion between the Chinese slave dealers, but it has been left for the Chronicle to make public the details of their formal organization.

There are in the city of San Francisco sixty-two establishments where Chinese girls are held in bondage for purposes of prostitution. Each of these places is presided over by a gwí gung, a female high priestess of prostitution, or a qui pah, a male master of the house. Seven of these sixty-two brothels are run on an independent basis, but the keepers of the other fifty-five are banded together in a society known as the Len Wo Tong. These fifty-five dens of iniquity afford occupation for 250 women and girls, and each of these, as well as the brothel-keepers themselves—

I call attention to this—has to pay a tribute of $1 a month into the treasury of the Len Wo Tong. Here, then, is a fund of $25 a month to start with, and an extra levy is always made when the fees paid to lawyers to defend the society's human "property" are extra large.

Here, therefore, is the nucleus of the Chinese slave traffic. The query may arise as to whether the bondage of the Chinese is confined exclusively to women and to immorality. The answer is in the affirmative.

But I will not stop to read further upon this loathsome subject.

Mr. GRAY. I will ask the Senator from Oregon whether these contracts are made now and carried out under present laws and those shiploads of persons brought in in contravention of the already stringent provisions of the Scott law?

Mr. MITCHELL. Not shiploads, perhaps, but they are coming in all the while one way and another. These contracts are being made, such as are referred to in this very article, showing the prices paid, as much as $1,300 being paid for one woman. They are regular written contracts drawn up, signed, sealed, and delivered.

Now, where I think the Committee on Foreign Relations are in one respect at fault in not reaching far enough in order to suppress this evil is in their recognition of the right of merchants, so-called, to come to this country. As stated by the Senator from Washington [Mr. SQUIRE] to-day, the testimony shows that there are really no merchants who come to this country, but hundreds of mere coolie laborers come in professing to be merchants, proved to be merchants by perjured Chinese testimony, and thus violate both law and treaty and defy the national authority.

Mr. BUTLER. May I inquire of the Senator from Oregon whether the State of California may not deal with this evil by its police laws?

Mr. MITCHELL. No State can ever deal successfully with a great evil like this.

Mr. BUTLER. Other States do.

Mr. MITCHELL. It will require the full legislative power of this nation expressed in the most emphatic manner to suppress this great evil.

Mr. GRAY. To suppress their coming, but the Senator from South Carolina I suppose refers to the present existence here.

Mr. BUTLER. That is what I refer to.

Mr. GRAY. He refers to what the Senator from Oregon has read an account of in the papers.

Mr. MITCHELL. The State and municipal authorities may deal as best they can of course with these evils where they find them exiting within their respective jurisdictions, but the belief is on the Pacific coast—of course there are exceptions—but the general belief there is, if I am not mistaken, and it is my unqualified opinion, that the only way to put an end to the immigration of even Chinese laborers to this country is to enact an absolute exclusion law, one that will not recognize the right of persons to come in as merchants or in any other capacity except as diplomatic and consular officials. That is what the House bill does. It is the same bill, as I said in respect of its repressive provisions, that was introduced by me in 1886, and which has been introduced by me at every session since, and as has been already shown it met with the general approval of the press and the people of the Pacific coast.

Mr. BUTLER. I will ask the Senator from Oregon if the direct way to get at that would not be to give China notice and abrogate the treaty out and out, without undertaking to meet the difficulties by statutes of Congress. There is no need to have treaties in existence between the two Governments and then pass laws which are in direct contravention of them. Still, the Senator says the laws will not prevent the evil. It is better just to abrogate the treaties out and out and cut off all intercourse with China.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is what the United States attempted to do in the Forty-fifth Congress, when it passed an act, by a large majority in both Houses of Congress, repealing the Burlingame treaty, as I showed awhile ago.

Mr. KENNA. Why did not the Senator support the bill repealing the treaty?

Mr. MITCHELL. I did. I supported the repeal of the treaty.

Mr. KENNA. My friend is certainly mistaken. I have the RECORD before me, and the Senator from Oregon voted against the passage of the bill.

Mr. MITCHELL. Against the passage of what bill?

Mr. KENNA. The Chinese bill.

Mr. MITCHELL. What Chinese bill?

Mr. KENNA. The Chinese bill which was vetoed by President Arthur.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am not talking about the Chinese bill vetoed by President Arthur.

Mr. KENNA. But the Chinese bill was vetoed by President Arthur on the ground—and the ground only—that it contravened the treaty; and on the motion to pass it notwithstanding the Presidential veto, my friend, the Senator from Oregon, voted "nay."

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator from West Virginia was never so much mistaken in all his life.

Mr. KENNA. I am glad to hear it, because I see from the RECORD—

Mr. MITCHELL. He never was so much mistaken in all his life. It is a mistake, pure and simple, on the part of my friend, because I was not in Congress at the time. The Senator evidently has in mind Mr. Mitchell of Pennsylvania.

Mr. KENNA. Possibly that may be the case, but I see the name "Mitchell" following this line all the way through.

Mr. MITCHELL. Certainly I never voted against any bill proposing to abrogate the Burlingame treaty. I have always advocated its repeal, either by treaty or by act of Congress. I was not a member of the Senate during President Arthur's Administration. It was Senator Mitchell of Pennsylvania evidently, and the Senator, my friend from West Virginia, has been misled.

Mr. KENNA. I beg the Senator's pardon, because I was surprised that he should have done so.

Mr. MITCHELL. It was a mistake any Senator might have made.

Mr. KENNA. It is perhaps due to myself to say that I did not get this volume of the RECORD with a view to ascertain the vote of the Senator from Oregon; I got it with a view to the record of some other Senators who occupy very peculiar relations to the present legislation as compared with their relations to former legislation on this subject. I happened to see the Senator's name, and I thought it worth while to call his attention to it.

Mr. MITCHELL. Now, I want to call attention to another circumstance in answer to the argument which is being made all the while, to the effect that we must not do anything to aggravate China and to the effect that we have dealt hastily with China in regard to these treaties. What did we do in 1888? Early in 1888 the Administration entered into a treaty upon the part of this Government with China which I hold in my hand. That treaty was signed, I believe, in March, 1888. It was transmitted to the Senate March 16, 1888. It was reported to the Senate by Senator SHERMAN, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, May 2, 1888, with two amendments only, and the treaty with those amendments was ratified on the 7th day of May, 1888.

To show that China did not act in good faith towards this Government, that the Chinese Government was insincere, to say the least, I want to call attention to the fact that the two amendments proposed by the Senate committee, and which were adopted by the Senate, do not change the meaning of the treaty in any respect, and were only put on by the Senate at the time, as I remember, in order to make more plain the meaning, and not with any intention of contradicting any of the provisions of the treaty as it had been agreed to by the Chinese Government and as it was sent to the Senate, or of adding any new features to it. What was the first amendment? Article I as agreed to by the Chinese Government reads as follows:

The high contracting parties agree that for a period of twenty years, beginning with the date of the exchange of the ratifications of this convention, the coming, except under the conditions hereinafter specified, of Chinese laborers to the United States shall be absolutely prohibited.

That was the clause to which the Senate tacked on the following amendment:

And this prohibition shall extend to the return of Chinese laborers who are not now in the United States, whether holding return certificates under existing laws or not.

The article thus amended, I submit, meant precisely the same as before amended. It included all Chinese before the amendment was put on, whether ever here before or not, and was so understood and construed by the Secretary of State, Secretary Bayard, in his letter of transmission to the Senate. In his letter of date March 16, 1888, Secretary Bayard, in referring to the treaty, makes the remark which I shall read, on page 2, Executive Document O, Confidential, which has been made public. After referring to the different articles he says:

This precludes the return of any Chinese laborers who are not now in this country, and forbids the coming into the United States of Chinese laborers from any quarter whatsoever.

What was the next amendment? It was to article 2. The article as transmitted to the Senate and as agreed to by the two Governments provided that such Chinese are permitted to go and come, namely, "any Chinese laborer who has a lawful wife, child, or parent in the United States, or property therein of the value of $1,000, or debts of like amount due him and pending settlement," should obtain a certificate before he left this country, which certificate should entitle him to return. That was the treaty as agreed to by the Chinese Government. The Senate put on this clause:

And no such Chinese laborer shall be permitted to enter the United States by land or sea without producing to the proper officer of the customs the return certificate herein required.

What was the object of requiring a certificate to be issued? It was that it might be the credentials entitling him to return his passport, and in order to make the thing a little more definite and plain the Senate added this amendment, which in no sense, as it seems to me, enlarges the provisions of the article, nor does it add to or restrict it.

Now, then, what does the Chinese Government do after having entered into this treaty? It was stated on the floor of the Senate last Saturday that after the treaty had been ratified by the Senate May 7, 1888, it had been immediately cabled to China by the Chinese minister. That date was May 7, 1888. The Scott exclusion act was not introduced into the House of Representatives until the 7th day of September, 1888. Three months, ninety long days, had been permitted to elapse, and the Chinese Government had made no response, so far as we are advised, as to its intentions in reference to this treaty. If these amendments of the Senate were objectionable to Chinese officials, why did they not say so? Why did they not communicate to Secretary Bayard and say to him: "The Senate has changed the treaty; it is not satisfactory to us." But no, sir, there was not one word, so far as these executive documents show. They were perfectly silent, silent as the grave, for three long months before the Scott exclusion bill was introduced.

Senators say we have acted hastily; that we have acted without first notifying the Chinese Government. Upon the contrary, we did not act hastily.

The Scott exclusion bill was not a hasty performance, in my judgment, upon the part of the member of the other House who introduced it. He represented the Administration, I take it, at the time. The Administration had done all that any administration ought to have been called upon to do after the treaty had been signed, although I never approved of the treaty, for the reason that its provisions were not sufficiently drastic to meet the evil aimed at. The Chinese minister cabled the treaty with these two unimportant amendments to the Chinese Government, and the Chinese Government goes into its tent and sulks, and refuses to respond; it neither says yea or nay. It gives no sign, and it makes no objection to the Senate amendments, so far as I am advised and so far as I have been able to ascertain.

Mr. PLATT. I was out of the Chamber for a moment. Let me ask the Senator when the treaty was ratified by the Senate?

Mr. MITCHELL. It was ratified by the Senate on the 7th day of May, 1888.

Mr. GRAY. With amendments.

Mr. MITCHELL. With two unimportant amendments, to which I called attention. The treaty was then immediately cabled, as we are advised, to the Chinese Government by the Chinese minister. We did not remain quiet. We went on in good faith in September, 1888, and passed an act with a view of carrying out the provisions of that treaty, supposing, of course, the treaty would soon become operative. We even went so far as to pass that bill through both Houses of Congress, and it went to the President and was signed by the President of the United States, President Cleveland, and I hold it in my hand.

Mr. GRAY. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. MITCHELL. Certainly.

Mr. GRAY. The treaty to which the Senator refers was sent into the Senate as a treaty already executed by the President and the Chinese Government?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. GRAY. It was sent in for the ratification of the Senate?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. GRAY. And the Senator from Oregon says that the Senate put an amendment to it?

Mr. MITCHELL. Two amendments.

Mr. GRAY. The Senate put two amendments to it, which did not in his opinion—

Mr. MITCHELL. Change the meaning.

Mr. GRAY. Which did not at all change the meaning or make more rigid the provisions contained in the treaty?

Mr. MITCHELL. That is what I think.

Mr. GRAY. Now, why did the Senate do that thing and thereby prevent the accomplishment of what had already been accomplished so far as the President of the United States and the Secretary of State were concerned?

Mr. MITCHELL. The only reason why they did so, in my judgment, is that it was thought by some that the meaning was a little obscure; that it was somewhat ambiguous. I do not believe that any member of the Senate was of the opinion that the amendments made a radical change or any change in fact in the real meaning of the document, but they did make the language perfectly plain so there could be no room for but the one construction.

Mr. GRAY. Treaties that came from that Administration to the Senate, no matter how meritorious, as this one seems to have been, appear to have failed of ratification here in the form in which they came.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not know about that. So far as I am concerned, I did not vote for that treaty. It was not satisfactory to me; it was not satisfactory to the people of the Pacific coast, although it was ratified with two slight amendments; and I think the amendments were presented by the committee in perfect good faith in order to make plain the meaning of the treaty.

Mr. PLATT. I was called out for a moment, and possibly the Senator has stated what would be an answer to a question I should like to ask.

Mr. MITCHELL. All right; what is it?

Mr. PLATT. Had China signified to our State Department at the time of the passage of the Scott exclusion act, whether it would agree to the treaty as amended or not?

Mr. MITCHELL. I stated while the Senator was out that the treaty, according to the record, was ratified in the Senate May 7, 1888; that it was cabled by the Chinese minister immediately to the Chinese Government, and no response was received. They had not stated that the amendments of the Senate were unsatisfactory or that they were satisfactory, nor had the Chinese Government given any reason up to the date of the introduction of the bill in the House of Representatives September 17, 1888, why they had not acted upon the amendments to the treaty.

I refer to this matter for the purpose of showing that the Government of the United States did not act hastily in passing the exclusion act October 1, 1888. We went on in perfect good faith, the treaty having been agreed to, and we passed an act for the purpose of carrying out its provisions, as I say, which was approved September 13, 1888. That is the act that the Congress of the United States passed, supposing, as a matter of course, the treaty would go into operation. It was passed in order to carry out the provisions of the treaty; but, of course, as the treaty never was accepted by the Chinese Government, the act as it stands is a dead letter on the statute book.

Mr. PLATT. Now, if the Senator will permit me, I think there is a little evidence that China would have agreed to that treaty with the amendments if it had not been for the passage of what is known as the Scott exclusion law.

Mr. MITCHELL. If there is such evidence, my attention has never been called to it.

Mr. PLATT. In the memorandum of the Chinese minister, June 23, 1891, which comes in the correspondence relating to Senator Blair's appointment as minister to China, the minister says "that the passing of that law while the treaty was being considered has had a very bad effect on China."

Mr. MITCHELL. That is a late correspondence.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the Senator will allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. MITCHELL. Certainly.

Mr. SHERMAN. I find by reference to the RECORD, which is the only evidence we have on the subject, that when the Scott bill was pending I made an appeal to the Senate to allow the bill to pass over, stating that the Chinese minister, who had not been here for some time, was then at Peru, on his way back, and there was a confident belief that if the passage of the Scott bill could be delayed until the Chinese minister should arrive a modification of the treaty would be made, so that the treaty would be approved and ratified by the Chinese Government, and a law passed to carry it into effect. I have here the statement that I made at that time, pending the debate. I said:

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I do not intend to prolong the debate on this bill, because I think the Senate ought to be willing to wait a day or two, or two or three days, until we ascertain, in response to the inquiry sent to the President, whether the fact on which this bill rests really exists.

That is, the allegation that the Chinese Government would not agree to it.

Yesterday, after information communicated to me in an informal way that we were acting in the dark and in haste upon information that was probably groundless, that the Senate was departing from its usual orderly proceeding upon a misapprehension of facts, I introduced a resolution, which was passed yesterday morning, calling on the President to inform us whether or not there was any information of any kind whatever indicating that the treaty with China was not to be ratified.

Then I go on to say:

I am decidedly in favor of the passage of this bill. If the Chinese Government has deliberately declined to negotiate further upon this subject, and has refused to accede to the universal demand of the American people that there shall be a restriction on this kind of immigration, then I am perfectly willing to pass a law asserting the power of the United States to regulate the coming of persons to this country, declaring who shall be kept out of it, and of passing such a bill without regard to the ordinary forms of legislation. But that fact has not been ascertained; we have no answer to the resolution of the Senate adopted yesterday. That answer will undoubtedly come to-day in the ordinary course of proceedings.

At that time the Chinese minister was on his way here, but Congress refused to wait until it could be ascertained. I find that thereupon a motion was made by some member of the Committee on Foreign Relations to postpone the consideration of the matter for a few days. That motion was defeated by one majority. By one majority only was it defeated, and after that time I refused to participate, and did not vote either for or against the bill. I have no doubt now, upon an examination of the debates as they occurred, that if we had waited two weeks until the Chinese minister arrived, negotiations would have been carried on, and we would have been enabled to pass in accordance with the treaty the general provisions of the Scott law. Is not that the way the Senator understands it? Is not that the history of it?

Mr. MITCHELL. I remember all about that, and it is just as the Senator has stated it, so far as his action is concerned. But here is the point: Ninety days, three long months, had elapsed from the time the treaty was cabled to the Chinese Government. Has the chairman of the committee any information now that any statement had come from the Chinese Government to the State Department in reference to the matter during all that time? The Senator says he has no doubt if we had waited until the Chinese minister arrived here that something would have been done.

Mr. SHERMAN. This shows perfectly well that the Chinese minister was on his way here from Peru. The delay was accounted for by the fact that his duties required him to go and spend a portion of his time in Peru. Information had been called for by the Senate upon the President to know whether the allegation which is now made was true, and it was thought that by waiting awhile we could probably have the assent of China to this modification of the treaty. I have no doubt that that was true; but as Congress would not wait we proceeded then to pass the Scott bill, and the President approved it. Then the Chinese Government, I suppose, took offense and refused to ratify the treaty as amended or in any way to recognize the law of 1888.

Mr. MITCHELL. However that may be, the fact is that the treaty entered into in March, 1888, was a most liberal treaty for the Chinese—so liberal that it was wholly unsatisfactory to the people of the Pacific coast. That treaty provided, among other things, that a Chinese person having a parent or child or husband or wife in this country should come and go.

Mr. DAWES. Should come back, not come and go.

Mr. MITCHELL. That he should come back. It provided that a person having a debt of a thousand dollars should be recognized in his right to come back. In addition to all that, it made an appropriation in the treaty of $276,619.75 as a matter of grace to the Chinese Government on account of massacres and troubles in Wyoming to indemnify them in that matter. So taken altogether, whatever may be said to the contrary, it was a most liberal proposition to a government which had pretended to be in favor of keeping their laborers at home, and yet they keep that treaty for ninety days without making any move whatever as to whether it was acceptable with the Senate amendments or not, and as a result Congress, tired of waiting, enacted the Scott exclusion act.

Mr. SHERMAN. The reason was that the Chinese minister was not here.

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator from Oregon permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. VEST. In the May number of the North American Review there is an article by John Russell Young, late minister to China, in which he corroborates the statement made by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN]. He asserts very positively that he knows the fact to exist that the Chinese Government has never felt any interest in promoting the immigration of their people to this country, and that but for the passage of the Scott act of 1888 (for which I voted, and I have never regretted it) the Chinese Government would have very gladly put additional stipulations in the treaty looking to the prevention of their citizens coming to this country. That statement, whatever it is worth, has been published in the North American Review, which came out in the last day or two.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Chinese Government, of course have their advocates in this country, and they are able. I have not read the article referred to in the North American Review. I have no doubt it is stated just as the Senator states it, so far as that is concerned. But I must hurry along as my friend from Florida [Mr. CALL] is entitled to a fair share of the remaining time.

A great deal has been said about our trade with China; that it would be broken off by this action. What is our trade with China? It is most insignificant in amount and value. Here are our exports. I hold in my hand a statement of our exports to China for the year ending June 30, 1891:

Wheat, not a bushel, not a pound.
Flour, 34,474 barrels, value $134,969.

Now we come to the principal and main articles:
Cloths, uncolored, 80,674,246 yards; value $5,321,500.
That and the one other article of illuminating gas are the only two items in the whole category that amount to anything at all.

Codfish, including haddock, hake, pollock, 12,270 pounds, value $894.
Canned salmon, 4,030 pounds, value $441.
Canned fish, other than salmon, $185.
Cordage, 2,492 pounds, $324.

Doors, sash, and blinds, $850.

House furniture, $1,583.

Flannels and blankets, $684.

Wearing apparel, $952.

Total value of exports of domestic merchandise, $8,700,308, while their imports were $19,321,850 for the year ending June 30, 1891.

The trade, Mr. President, is all on their side. We have sent to China within the last twenty years over $200,000,000 in gold and silver to pay our balances. From 1870 to 1885 we had sent $135,000,000, and since then we have sent a sufficient amount to make it, as I say, more than $200,000,000 in gold and silver to pay our balances. Then talk to me about the Chinese breaking off intercourse with us, destroying that trade so valuable to them, simply because we exercise our sovereign right to protect ourselves against dangers that we all regard as real to the institutions of our country! They will never do it, Mr. President. Now, I must not take up any more time, at least not much.

Mr. PLATT. If the Senator will permit me, I think the argument he is making now would lead to breaking off trade relations with almost all South American countries, from whom we receive more than we send to them. For instance, we have been paying a great deal of money out to Brazil, and through London for that matter, but the same argument that the Senator makes with regard to China would hold good, that the trade of Brazil was not worth continuing.

Mr. MITCHELL. It will be time enough to consider what we shall do in reference to our treaties with Brazil when the case comes up, so far as that is concerned.

I wish to say one word in regard to the rejection of Mr. Blair. I agree fully with all that has been stated by my friend on my right [Mr. TELLER] as to the international law in the case. I agree that any nation has a right to reject a minister named for that country without giving any reasons whatever. But while that right exists, while the right to object to a person because he is personally unacceptable, without assigning any reasons, exists, I insist that when a nation, instead of exercising that right, objects to a minister and gratuitously assigns as reasons grounds that do not relate to him personally, but which amount to an objection to the nation, on account of some national act, then the least that can be said of it is that that nation has been guilty of a studied insult.

Let me call attention to this particular case. The final objection to Mr. Blair was because he had voted for a certain act of Congress that became a part of the supreme law of the land. I say that that objection was not a personal objection but it amounted to a national objection. The moment that that act became a part of the supreme law of the land it became the duty of every citizen of the United States to stand by it and assist in its faithful execution. The objection is one that goes to the nation because it had placed on the statute book legislation that the Chinese Government regarded as obnoxious to them.

Suppose that the President of the United States should tomorrow send to the Senate as minister to Great Britain the name of THOMAS B. REED, of Maine, or suppose he should send as minister to the court of St. James the name of William McKinley, jr., of Ohio, that the Senate should ratify either of the nominations, and Great Britain should come back and say "Mr. REED or Mr. McKinley is not acceptable to us." That would be all very well. She would have a right to do that, nobody can object; but suppose she went a step further and gave reasons, and said "we object to Mr. REED, or we object to Mr. McKinley, as the case might be, because he participated in the passage of a law which now stands upon your statute books, which we regard as obnoxious to our country, and therefore we object." I say that then it becomes a case not of mere persona non grata, not an objection to the person merely, but to the nation. I desire to inquire what this administration, or this Government, or the people of this country would think of an objection of that kind coming to the nomination and confirmation of Mr. REED or Mr. McKinley. Unless I am very much mistaken in my conception of things, such an objection, when no reasons at all were necessary or required to be given, would be regarded in the light of a diplomatic insult, and our minister to the court of St. James would, in fitting response, be recalled.

Now, Mr. President, before closing I want to refer to one other matter referred to by my friend from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS]. My friend, genial, able, erudite as he is, losing sight evidently for the moment of the great evils, the great dangers to this country likely to result from continued Chinese immigration; forgetting for the moment the lesson which history teaches us as to what the pagan Chinese did over five hundred years ago, when, under the great Tamerlane, by the mere force of overpowering numbers, they subdued principalities and peoples along the Tigris, the Euphrates, the Volga, the Ganges, and the Nile—looking away beyond all this, my friend from Minnesota imagines he sees a more ominous, a more portentous cloud of danger to our institutions in another form and in another direction; and in comparison, he loses sight evidently for the time being of the dangers and the demoralizations of Chinese immigration to this country, and comparing Cahensly as representing the one theory and Confucius as representing the other, he gives the palm to Confucius and crowns him with eulogy.

My friend is apprehensive that a movement set on foot last year, I believe, by a comparatively obscure member of the Prussian Diet, and which movement, as very properly and very truthfully stated by the Senator from Minnesota, was on its first presentation denounced by His Holiness Leo XIII, in the Vatican, and reprobated by Cardinal Gibbon and Archbishop Ireland in this country, will result in the disintegration of American civilization, and in the establishment in this country of as many different nations as there are people and as there are tongues. I tell my friend from Minnesota what has been done once may be done again.

If those vast hordes of Chinese pagans, led on by the great Mongolian leader, Tamerlane, over five centuries ago, could, not by military prowess, but by the mere force of overpowering numbers, make a track of desolation through Russia and Turkey and Egypt and India which required for centuries the energies of all those nations to obliterate, they may do it again. What pagan China has done in Europe, it is possible for her to do in America. Russia has felt the shock of Chinese invasion. She has been overpowered in her provinces, and her country desolated, not by warlike men, but by the mere force and immensity of overpowering numbers. The present Czar of Russia, living in the sunlight of the history of the past, is keenly alive to the dangers to that country from another Chinese invasion. But, in my humble judgment, leaving out of consideration all question of any wholesale invasion, I believe the continual immigration of Chinese to this country, even in a limited form, will result in great danger eventually to the people and the institutions of this country.

While I believe that is so, I do not think there is any well-grounded fear that this great political edifice of ours, occupied, as it is, by sixty-five million of intelligent patriotic people, mainly of the Anglo-Saxon race, an edifice whose foundations are Christianity and patriotism, whose pillars are upheld by millions of patriotic men, native and foreign born, and representing many creeds, will ever be moved from its base in the slightest degree by the establishment of any imperium in Imperio, or by any confusion of tongues.

Mr. President, the builders of American civilization, marching proudly on as they are to-day in the vanguard of the world's progress, were never born to be "scattered and peeled" by any man, or sect, or nation, however wise or great, who might plot or combine to establish in our midst a Babelistic confusion of tongues.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I desire to say a few words, which have been suggested to me since the debate on Friday last, in reference to the rejection of my late colleague, ex-Senator Blair, as minister to China. From a careful examination of the correspondence I am inclined to believe that the Chinese Government, or, at any rate, the foreign office of China, has never deliberately determined that Mr. Blair should not be received. There seems to have been an unfortunate treatment of the subject, to say the least, by this Administration.

It will be remembered that I stated to the Senate that it did not appear that our Government had placed on paper anywhere its objections to the rejection of Senator Blair until the letter of October 6. That fact appears very plainly from the correspondence which is before the Senate. The information that the Chinese Government did not desire to receive Mr. Blair came from China apparently in two cablegrams received on the 25th of April, 1891, and there resulted from those cablegrams an oral presentation of the objections by the representatives of the Chinese legation here in Washington to the Acting Secretary of State. I do not understand that this presentation was made by the Chinese minister, but by a different representative of the legation in Washington.

It also appears that on the 15th day of June, 1891, the Acting Secretary of State, Mr. Wharton, requested the Chinese minister to ask his Government to reconsider the question whether they would or would not receive Mr. Blair. The question was, "Will the Chinese Government hear the United States on the question whether there are reasons for the exclusion of Mr. Blair?" The minister asked Mr. Wharton at that time what new facts he proposed to present, and Mr. Wharton said:

I announced that I was not then prepared to say, but had simply to request a reopening of the matter by the Chinese Government, in order that I might have an opportunity to inform it fully of Mr. Blair's position, so that we could in this country have the satisfaction of feeling that the unwillingness of his Government to receive Mr. Blair, if it should so finally express itself, was based upon no misapprehension of fact.

The minister said that he would telegraph to his Government what I had said and would inform me of the answer as soon as received.

The next we hear from this subject is on the 23d day of June, and then, again, by an oral conference and a mere memorandum, in which China is put in the position of declining the request of the United States Government to reconsider its action concerning Mr. Blair. It is in that paper that is introduced the extraordinary proposition that if the President or the Secretary of State would cause to be repealed the Scott act and put in force again the treaties, it would not make much difference what Mr. Blair had said, he would be received as the minister from the United States to China.

It is to be carefully noted that up to this time our Government had put nothing upon paper and had made no statement to China that the grounds upon which it had placed its decision to refuse to receive Mr. Blair were, in the opinion of this Government, untenable.

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS] and also the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] have taken occasion to reiterate what no one denies that a Government is not obliged, when refusing to receive a minister as persona non grata, to give any reason for its refusal. That is entirely true, but it is equally true and equally well recognized by the authorities and by the practice of governments on this subject that if the government rejecting a minister as persona non grata takes occasion to give reasons for the rejection, those reasons then become the proper and legitimate and necessary subjects of discussion between the governments of the two countries, and when the reason given was, as in this case, that the person accredited as minister had uttered language in the Senate of the United States which was offensive to the foreign government, and moreover had voted for a law of his own country which is offensive to the foreign government, it was absolutely incumbent upon this Government, if it had any regard for its own honor and its own dignity and its own self-respect, to at once take issue in a direct, positive, unequivocal, and formal manner with the government which had undertaken to reject a minister upon those grounds.

Moreover, it was due in this case as an act of justice to the person who had been selected not at his own request, but by reason of the free, unbiased choice of the President, to represent this country in China, to place before the Chinese Government the fact that of all the men in the United States Senate who had spoken and had voted upon the subject of Chinese exclusion, Mr. Blair was the last Senator of all to be rejected on account of his sentiments or his utterances or his votes upon the question of Chinese exclusion.

Mr. President, this Government did nothing of the kind. It contented itself with asking the Chinese Government to hear it. It received an oral statement, reiterating the charges against Mr. Blair, but offering to receive him if the law could be repealed. It was only on the 6th of October that there was written and sent to China for communication to the Chinese Government the formal state paper which vindicated Mr. Blair and justified the President in undertaking to send him to China as our minister.

I do not believe that the Chinese Government, if it had received that paper of October 6, or if it had been made acquainted in a proper and formal manner at any time with the facts stated in that paper concerning Mr. Blair, would have persisted in its refusal to receive him. I believe that at the very first moment when this appropriate, suitable, and dignified statement of the objection of the United States to the rejection of one of its ministers on unjust grounds had come to the attention of the Chinese Government, that Government would have said that it had no objection to the appointment of Mr. Blair, that it reconsidered its determination, and would be glad to receive him as minister.

I can not help coming to the conclusion that Mr. Blair has been rejected, and there has been persistence in the rejection, because our Government has not properly defended its minister and brought home to the Chinese Government the injustice and the error of its rejection of Mr. Blair. This letter of October 6, as I stated on Friday last, went to Mr. Denby, and he did nothing with it. On the 25th of March Mr. Wharton seems to have discovered that the Chinese Government never had been informed that we dissented from the reasons which it had given for the rejection of Mr. Blair, and I undertake to say that I do not understand that up to this very hour the Chinese Government has been informed that we do not think they ought to reject a minister because of words spoken in debate in the Senate.

I do not understand that the Chinese Government has as yet learned of the facts which are contained in the communication of October 6, and I believe that those facts being known to the Chinese Government, it is a government of such character and of such wisdom that its rejection of Mr. Blair will be withdrawn and he will be taken out from the position in which he has been placed by reason of this unfortunate rejection of him by the Chinese Government.

Mr. PLATT. Why does the Senator say that he does not know that the Chinese Government has been informed? Has he any reason to doubt that Mr. Denby, the minister there, disregarded the instructions of the Secretary of March 25?

Mr. CHANDLER. On March 25, 1892, Mr. Wharton said:

Mr. Wharton to Mr. Denby.

[Telegram.]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, March 25, 1892.

If you have not already communicated Instruction 659, October 6, to the Chinese Government, do so immediately.

WHARTON, Acting.

I have reason to believe that the communication has not reached or had not a few days ago reached the Chinese Government. I do not know why Mr. Denby withheld that communication; I do not know whether the facts have failed to reach the Chinese Government entirely through the fault of any one person. I think the Administration should have taken more pains to see that their objections reached the Chinese Government. I think that more pains should have been taken to see that the letter of October 6 reached the Chinese Government. I do not understand that the Chinese minister who now represents China in Washington himself personally had knowledge of this communication of October 6 until within a very short period, until the publication, in fact, of the correspondence by the United States Senate.

The Chinese minister is obliged to communicate with our Secretary of State through the medium of an interpreter, and it is to be feared that there has been some misinterpretation of oral and of written communications not only to the minister here but to his Government at home. I am disposed to think, indeed I believe, through the failure of the Chinese legation here to possess a suitable interpreter there has been an entire failure of the views and the protests of the United States Government, through the fault of proper interpretation, to reach either the Chinese Government, the foreign office in Peking, or the Chinese minister himself in this city. The minister was absent at the time when the Chinese Government first sent word to this country that Mr. Blair was rejected. He had been absent for a large portion of the time and he has been obliged to rely upon oral statements and oral interpretations made by his interpreters to him since that time, and never has received and never has had full knowledge of the situation of this case until this moment.

I am not, under these circumstances, disposed to prejudice the Chinese Government nor the Chinese foreign office nor the Chinese minister in this capital for the unfortunate situation in which Mr. Blair is placed or for the unfortunate situation in which that Government is placed, because I am unable to find any evidence that up to this moment the Chinese Government or the Chinese minister have been informed of the true position of the United States, which is that there was in fact no objection to Mr. Blair on the ground of any hostility of his to China, but that, on the contrary, he had been one of the foremost and best friends of the Chinese Government and as much disposed as any Senator to observe good faith towards that Government, nor informed of the fact that it would not be treated as a friendly act by this Government if a minister was rejected by the Chinese Government on account of words spoken in debate in the Senate.

It is my present conviction, which I take occasion to make of record, and which I believe I ought to make of record, that both the Chinese Government and the Chinese minister have been kept from a knowledge of the position of this Government, first, through a delay on the part of the Administration and the United States minister in China to communicate the position of this Government, and, secondly, because of a lack of capable and truthful and honest interpretation of the English language by the Chinese interpreters to the Chinese minister and to the Chinese foreign office.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, the importance of this bill and the policy which it establishes entitle it to a high degree of careful consideration. The bill proposes the entire exclusion of Chinese from the United States, and as a consequence, the entire exclusion of the people of the United States from China. It is a bill declaring it to be the policy of the people of the United States that there shall be absolutely no intercourse between them and the vast multitudes which comprise the population of China. This population embraces nearly one-half of the human race.

I hold in my hand a book written within the last few years, a book of high authority by a distinguished scholar, S. Wells Williams, LL. D., professor of the Chinese language and literature at Yale College, which says of this people, vast as they are in numbers and ancient in their history:

The condition and characteristics of the various families of man inhabiting this great Empire, render its study far more interesting than anything relating to its physical geography or public works.

The sons of Ham are indeed a remarkable race, whether regard be had to their antiquity, their numbers, their Government, or their literature, and on these accounts deserve the study and respect of every intelligent student of mankind: while their unwearied industry, their general peaceableness and good humor, and their attainments in domestic order and mechanical arts, commend them to the notice of every one who sees in these points of character an earnest of their future position amid the great family of civilized nations.

The consideration of the capabilities of this vast portion of the human race is an essential element to the determination of the question whether or not the people of the United States shall deliberately adopt a policy of absolute prohibition of all kinds of intercourse with them.

Let us look a little into what this race of people are, what has been their past, and what is probably their future in respect of development of all the arts and all the industries upon which the prosperity and advancement of mankind depend, and upon which the comfort of the great toiling, impoverished masses of the American people must themselves depend.

From another little brochure by Mr. James A. Whitney, a very beautifully written and very instructive little work, written from the standpoint of the prohibitionists, of those who are in favor of absolute nonintercourse between the people of this country and those of China, I shall read a few paragraphs for the purpose of giving an idea to the country of what these people are, what is their number, and what is their prospective advance in civilization, for it is not the commerce of to-day, as read by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL], that is important in determining this question, it is the commerce of tomorrow and of a hundred years hence, when these two great empires of population and of power, the people of the United States and the people of the Orient, shall have progressed to be great corresponding powers. This book says:

A population comprising substantially one-half of the human race, of a mental, moral, and physical type, indigenous to the soil, unmodified by external influences and intensified by isolation and successive repetition through tens of centuries, must, in the nature of things, possess an inertia peculiarly its own.

And the statistics which he gives and the estimate upon which this is based I will read:

The population of China in A. D. 1753 was 102,300,000. Seven years later it was 143,125,000. Five years later yet, 198,314,000. Seven years after this, viz. in 1792, in round numbers, 333,000,000, and in 1812, the latest census, 331,221,000. The increase between 1753 and 1792 represents a normal increase under the best conditions, for this period of about forty years was the most peaceful and prosperous that China had known for several centuries. In that time her far-sighted policy in excluding the restless and adventurous foreigner bore its most abundant fruit, and except that the military spirit of the people was lulled to sleep by the peace of these and many preceding years her progress was definite and great.

The rapid and marked diminution of the ratio of growth of the population from 1792 to 1812 is admitted by English writers and proven by other evidence to be due to the introduction and consumption of opium. In the absence of positive data, the annual increase since the date last mentioned may be approximately calculated at 1 per cent per annum, which is but one-fifth of the normal ratio of a laboring population not subjected to any specially deteriorating influence and adequately supplied with food. Small as this ratio is, a simple and arithmetical calculation shows that the Chinese number at the present time in the neighborhood of 750,000,000, or from two-fifths to one-half of the entire population of the globe.

Shall we adopt a policy of absolute prohibition by law of intercourse with either 750,000,000 or any small fraction of that population? Shall we assume that so vast a portion of the human race are incapable of civilization and incapable of progress? Shall we declare that the principles of our republican Government and of our religion are a failure and can have no effect upon these people when brought in contact with them? Such a proposition finds no warrant in reason and no warrant in the history of these people.

Let us look a little into that history and see what it is, and who these people are. For that purpose I will detain the Senate for a short time by reading a few extracts from this interesting book. It was these people who—discovered the polarity of the magnetic needle and applied it to use in the compass, and obviated its dip by the simple device of placing its weight below the point of suspension; and it was this, too, that first perceived and made allowance for the variation of the needle from the true pole, these, as I have occasion to remark in another place, having been transmitted through Arabian channels to the merchants and mariners of Europe. It was to the Chinese intellect that was due the invention of printing and its perfection even beyond the requirements of the language, for with the Chinese alphabet there is no advantage in interchangeable types; and this, like the compass, but by another route, passed from China into the possession of the West.

It was from this, also, that arose the invention of paper in the first century of our era, the production of inks having a carbon base, as with the printer's ink of to-day and the manufacture of lampblack from the burning of oils. It was this that devised the drilling of grain as distinguished from broadcast ing and were degraded, this Republic of ours, founded as a light for the people of the world, should have no obligation to perform towards elevating and improving and instructing nearly one-half of the human race?

Mr. President, let us see whether there is any necessity for this, whether there are any other methods by which the result of limiting the immigration of these people may be attained or the prohibition of them in particular States where the people are unfriendly to them and where their competition might interfere with the industry of the native people.

What is the trouble in the State of California to-day legislating to prevent the social evils which the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] alluded to. Is our republican system of State governments inadequate to eradicate a social evil of any kind? Can we not make laws and execute them of sufficient rigour equal to that which any other people can, to suppress vice in any form which it may assume? Here we have a national policy of prohibition, founded upon the idea that the State governments are inadequate to preserve their people from moral contamination by the suppression of vice. There is no ground for this proposition. Why is it not practicable for this Government, negotiating a treaty with China, to say that we will let Chinese in certain quantities and of certain employments come here for certain purposes of study, of education, of commerce, or of trade, limiting it as the country may need, and also so to be admitted to such States as shall not forbid their admission.

Is a treaty of that description, recognizing the authority of the States and allowing free egress to those who are permitted to come in to States which desire their admission? There is no trouble in establishing a treaty of that sort and leaving it to the legislation of the States to exclude them.

The ninth section of the first article of the Constitution provides:

The migration or importation of such persons as any of the States now existing shall think proper to admit shall not be prohibited by the Congress prior to the year 1808.

That implies that, Congress not exercising its authority, the States may prohibit the migration or importation of such persons as they see fit, certainly being supervised by the paramount authority of Congress, if it sees fit to require them to be admitted.

But why is it not adequate to all these purposes of prohibition of this evil upon the Pacific coast, that a treaty should be made recognizing the right and power of the States to prohibit absolutely, if they see fit to do so, by a majority of their people, in their State legislation or their constitution, the admission of these immigrants? I apprehend that the Chinese people, the Emperor of China, and the public authorities of that Empire would not object to a proposition of that kind, that the local State government being unfriendly to their admission, the treaty should provide that they should not be admitted into such a State.

Are we to be told that there are no systems of registration, of police inspection, or of the execution of the laws known to the States by which a Chinaman coming into a State can be identified, recognized, removed, and, if necessary, extradited? There is no difficulty in California or in Oregon providing a State system of legislation by the permission of the Congress of the United States in a treaty with China, by which every Chinaman who comes into either of those communities can be required not only to register, but also to keep himself in communication with the public authorities as to his residence and even his temporary place of abode. The whole subject is perfectly in the power not only in respect to the admission and the egress of those people, but also in respect of their vices and the suppression of them by the local authority of those States.

So, Mr. President, taking this bill and these declarations that our people are to have no commercial intercourse—for that is unquestionably what it is as shown conclusively in the very able and clear exposition of the House bill made by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations—this bill declaring that there shall be no intercourse of any kind whatever between the people of the United States and the people of China, for that is the unquestionable force and effect of the bill, you can not suppose that the Chinese people, when we declare here that they shall be absolutely prohibited from coming to this country, except as diplomatic or other public officials, and provide for their arrest and punishment with a degraded punishment if they violate this law, and provide a penalty upon every person who shall bring them—there can be no question that this nation, which has existed for these thousands of years, famous in statecraft, famous for its protection of its own people, with its wisdom, the accumulation of many centuries—this people, who have been able to defy the changes which have destroyed all other races and all other peoples for hundreds of centuries—there can be no question that these people would retaliate by making a similar declaration and no payment of one hundred millions or two hundred millions of dollars to this immensely rich country would be of avail to prevent their Government from excluding Americans precisely as the Chinese are to be excluded from our domain.

What is to be the effect of this policy upon the great cotton-producing interests of this country? Cotton is already at such a price that it brings no remuneration to the producer, and a vast section of the people of this country are absolutely dependent upon it for all the comforts of life. What is to be the effect of this policy of saying that one-half the human race shall be excluded from the privilege of dealing with our people and obtaining the fabrics which are produced from our cotton, whether here or in England or elsewhere? What is to be the effect upon this interest of this prohibitory, this exclusive policy, which this bill provides? Why, Mr. President, in an economical point of view alone, looking to this single production of the Southern States, I should say that this bill ought not to be passed, but ought to meet with the condemnation of the whole country.

How about the production of wheat? China is a great grain-producing region, but with its vast overflowing population there have been periods of time and are now in India and China in which the supplies of wheat from this country will readily find a market. Are we to deny to our wheat-growers the possibility of a market there?

Upon all these considerations it seems to me that the mere statement that because these people who come here possess certain vices, because they are transitory and return to China, carrying with them the avails of their labor, but leaving behind them great works of industry and permanent improvement—that because of their competing successfully and more cheaply with American labor we shall exclude them from the whole country, is a consequence that has no premise to sustain it.

Why not admit them to those parts of the country where their labor may be useful? Why declare this policy since we have here in our midst a vast portion of another population which we have civilized, more diverse from the Anglo-Saxon than are this people and yet pursuing the paths of peaceful industry and progressing in civilization? Why not say the powerful influences of our republican system, our educational system, our religious system, are adequate, with proper police and municipal regulations, to deal with this evil? Why not prohibit the Chinese from exercising the elective franchise? Why not, if necessary, deny by law their right to become citizens? Why not leave to the States the economies which shall prescribe such prices for labor, either in their great trade organizations or otherwise, that these people may be required to conform to, instead of declaring the impossible doctrine that there shall be absolute nonintercourse, commercial, educational, scientific, mechanical, and of any and every kind, between them and us?

The writer of this book, Mr. Whitney, advocates strongly absolute exclusion upon the theory that the greater power of this vast multitude of people, as suggested by the Senator from Oregon who spoke this morning, will so increase with the knowledge of the arts of offense and defense which this age is developing, that they will be dangerous to the future safety and independence of the people of this country. But suppose that to be so, how will the policy of isolation and exclusion contribute in any degree to the diminution of that power? Suppose it to be true that this people with their vast numbers will increase and grow and become skilled in the use of arms, of naval architecture, and of naval warfare until they can transport to this country or elsewhere an indefinite and sufficient number of people to overpower us, how will the policy of exclusion protect us from that result?

So it must be by the power of intercourse, by impressing upon them our superior powers, by measuring strength with them, and if there is to be, as I have no idea and we can see nothing to warrant it—if there is an irrepressible conflict between the Chinese power and ourselves, let us prepare to meet it by a knowledge of it. But I have no fears. The military power of this Anglo-Saxon race and the religious power of our civilization and our Christianity need have no fear from these Mongolian people with their vast antiquity and in their vast numbers, inhabiting, as they do, the most fertile and prolific region of the world. I have no apprehension of that result.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from Florida and the Senate to the unanimous agreement made by the Senate on the last legislative day that debate should cease upon the bill at 4 o'clock to-day and the vote be taken upon the pending question.

Mr. CALL. I have no desire to continue the discussion further.

Mr. TELLER. I rise to make an inquiry as to the bill. I did not fully hear the arrangement made, I wish to inquire, if the House bill is adopted instead of the Senate amendment, will it be open to amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the understanding of the Chair. The pending question is on the amendment proposed by the Committee on Foreign Relations. If that amendment shall prevail by adoption, then it will be open to amendment as the text of the bill. If it should be defeated, then the bill as it came from the other House will be open to amendment. The question is on the adoption of the amendment reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. FELTON. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CASEY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO].

Mr. DAVIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE], and therefore withhold my vote. If he were present I should vote "yea."

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL]. I do not know how he would vote. If he were present I should vote "yea."

Mr. McMILLAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE], but he has sent me word that he is in favor of the amendment, and I vote "yea."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (when Mr. MANDERSON's name was called). The occupant of the chair is paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN]. The Chair understands that if that Senator were present he would vote "yea," and therefore the occupant of the chair votes "yea."

Mr. MILLS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

Mr. PLATT (when his name was called). My colleague [Mr. HAWLEY] is absent and is paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL], but upon this question I think my colleague would vote, if present, as the Senator from Missouri voted, that is, in favor of the report of the committee. I am paired with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BARBOUR], but I am at liberty to vote upon this question. I vote "yea."

Mr. COCKRELL. In this connection I desire to say that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] before leaving the Chamber told me that he would vote with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] upon this matter, and as I supposed the Senator from Ohio would vote for the committee's substitute, I voted.

Mr. PUGH (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]. On this amendment, however, he would vote "yea." That is my vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WOLCOTT (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA]. If he were present I should vote "nay," and I think he would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. PERKINS. I was told that I was paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE], but the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS] informs me that he is paired with him, and hence I vote "yea," unless I am advised that I have another pair. I am quite willing to obey orders.

Mr. DOLPH. I announce my pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE].

The result was announced—yeas 43, nays 14; as follows:

So the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment becomes the text of the bill. The text of the bill is open to amendment, and under the unanimous agreement of the Senate amendments are to be considered under the five-minute rule.

Mr. PLATT. I offer the amendment of which I gave notice some time since.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 1, line 5, after the word "descent," it is proposed to insert:

Excepting only the act approved October 1, 1888, entitled "An act supplement to an act entitled 'An act to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese,' approved the 6th day of May, 1882."

So as to read:

That all laws now in force prohibiting and regulating the coming into this country of Chinese persons and persons of Chinese descent, excepting only the act approved October 1, 1888, entitled "An act a supplement to an act entitled 'An act to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese,' approved the 6th day of May, 1882," are hereby continued in force for a period of ten years from the passage of this act.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, the effect of this amendment, if adopted, would be to exclude from the provision which extends the present laws relating to the coming of Chinese persons for ten years the Scott act, so called. It would extend for ten years all other laws relating to the coming of Chinese. It would not extend the provisions of the Scott act.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to inquire of the Senator what effect it would have on the Scott act. Is not that an act without limitation?

Mr. PLATT. That is a conundrum which I can not answer in five minutes. If the Scott act is limited to the time mentioned in the other laws, this would prevent its extension. If it is not limited in its operation, this would have no effect upon it. As to that legal question I am not able at this time to speak.

But I can not vote for the bill without this amendment. We are told that the passage of that act was a violation of the treaty of 1880. It is agreed on all sides that it was a violation of that treaty. It has been remonstrated against by the Chinese Government, and we are told in a dispatch which has been read here that they have addressed repeated notes to the State Department claiming that it was a violation of the treaty, none of which have received any notice by the State Department. Under those circumstances I can not again vote by an extension of that act to abrogate the treaty or vote for a bill which is in conflict with it. I know that I voted for it before. I voted for it under protest. As all Senators know, it was voted for under somewhat peculiar circumstances. It has been thrown in the face of everybody who voted for it and who is to-day opposed to the House bill that we violated or abrogated the treaty of 1880; that we propose to do it again by this bill, and that we should not stickle very much about going further and violating the treaty more. I do not propose hereafter to be charged with violating the treaty by voting for the bill as it is since the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President—

Mr. PLATT. I have only five minutes, and I want to say this in that time: I do not believe it is necessary to extend the Scott law. I believe the laws of 1882 and 1884 are amply sufficient to protect this country against the coming of Chinese laborers into it. I believe, and I think there is no question about it, that since the law of 1882 went into operation the number of Chinese laborers in this country has diminished by at least 35,000 or 40,000. There were in 1880, in round numbers, 105,000 Chinese laborers in this country. There came into this country, according to the immigration records, in the year ending June 30, 1881, 11,890; in 1882, 39,579; in the year ending June 30, 1883, 8,031. That is about 60,000. So it is safe to assume that by the time those laws took effect there were 160,000 Chinese laborers in this country. The present census, not entirely complete and not entirely accurate, but accurate enough for all purposes, however, shows that there are now in the country about 110,000. There are at the outside figures from 35,000 to 40,000 less Chinese laborers in the country now than there were when that act was passed. It is a diminishing evil, and it is not necessary to violate treaties, and if we have done it, to violate them over again, to diminish and finally remove and eradicate this evil.

I am willing to do what we can do, keeping faith, for after all that has been said here I do hold that there is some obligation on the Government to keep faith with a nation with whom it makes a treaty and a contract. I do believe that keeping faith with China, extending these laws for another ten years, we shall have practically eradicated the evil, if it be one, and I agree that it is one, resulting from this undesirable class of immigration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I think logically the advocates of the Senate committee's amendment ought to vote for the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut. Certainly the adoption of that amendment will have a beneficial effect upon our relations with China. Perhaps I ought to vote for it, because we have the assurance of China that if we will do that my late colleague will be willingly received as minister to that Empire. Senators will realize what they are voting in the face of if they adopt the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut.

The minister says that the passing of that law while the treaty was being considered has had a very bad effect in China. If the President or the Secretary of State could do anything to repeal that law and to put in force again the treaties, the situation in China would be much changed; and then it would not make much difference what Mr. Blair has said and he would be well received if the President asked for it. But Mr. Wharton—

There is another point to which I call the attention of the Senate, and before we finally vote here we ought to have some light on the subject. Perhaps the Senator from Connecticut may give us some light on this subject.

But Mr. Wharton must know that the last Chinese minister had written to Mr. Bayard and afterwards to Mr. Blaine long notes, and that he had also written Mr. Blaine notes complaining of the passing of that law, showing by great American public men that—

That is the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] and the late Senator from New York, Mr. Evarts—

It was against the treaties and in violation of all the conduct of the United States to all other governments, and that its passage had done great harm and loss to many thousands of poor Chinese; and Mr. Wharton must know that the United States Government has not made any answer to these complaints.

Mr. President, we are legislating here entirely in the dark on this subject. We are taking up a work that, if we repeal the Scott law and mend the broken treaty and again go back to those treaties, we are doing entirely in the dark. As to what the reasons were why there have been no answers made to the many complaints of the Chinese Government against the passage of the Scott law, about the only thing we do know is that notwithstanding they have refused to receive Mr. Blair on account of words spoken in debate in the Senate, if we will only do this thing, no matter what he may have said, they will take him as minister if the President continues to desire it. I have no knowledge on the last point.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I hope the amendment will not be adopted. The old law led to a great deal of fraud and scandal, to habeas corpus proceedings, and litigation, and fraudulent certificates, and it was impracticable in its operations. A great many Chinese came in under it. It was a very defective arrangement. There are many leaks in the present law, but nothing like as many as existed under the other acts. They led to innumerable scandals. It was impossible to execute them with anything like decency. The Chinese had learned so many ways of evading them by fraudulent contrivances that it became a public scandal involving nearly half of the community. The laws were exceedingly loose, without safeguards; and it would be a very dangerous step to repeal the Scott law and revive those ancient and defective statutes.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I feel a good deal of hesitation in regard to this amendment. I believe the Scott law was one of the most vicious laws that have been passed in my time in Congress. I believe now and I believed then it was a mere political race between the two Houses, then opposed to each other in politics, in the face of a Presidential election. I say it was a mere political race between two political parties to try and influence the vote of the Pacific coast in the last Presidential election. When the bill came here it had passed the other House nem. con. on the day it was introduced. It came to the Senate and it was not referred to any committee. A proposition to postpone it for a few days to ascertain whether the Chinese embassy would not agree to the provisions of it as a part of the treaty was voted down by almost a tie vote; I believe there was one majority against the motion; and the bill was finally passed.

I believe the passage of that law prevented the negotiation of a treaty which would have accomplished the object. The whole sum and substance and the only provision in the Scott law that had any weight or effect was the declaration that when Chinamen went to China and attempted to return they should not be again admitted into our country. That I believe was the only provision, was it not?

Mr. MITCHELL. Chinese laborers.

Mr. SHERMAN. That laborers who had been here and went over from our country to China and remained there awhile should not return.

Mr. PLATT. And it canceled the certificates.

Mr. MITCHELL. It canceled the certificates. That was the most important feature.

Mr. SHERMAN. I believe from the light of history and from what I learn from the debates that if that bill had not been passed within two weeks after the time it did pass a treaty would have been made by the Chinese Government agreeing that when a Chinaman should return to China he should not have the privilege of coming back to America if he was a Chinese laborer. No one then proposed to interfere with the right of merchants to go and come.

Now, if this amendment should be adopted I think the bill would stand with the amendment in it on stronger grounds than it would without it; but I do not myself care to vote to change the existing law. My inclination now is to vote against the amendment and leave the law as it stands. We have got to be consistent somewhat when we attempt to carry out our laws. The object of the bill, as reported by our committee, is simply to continue the existing status for ten years longer, leaving open, however, all the time to the Executive authority the right to make treaties and to Congress the right to pass laws without limit. We simply provide for a bridge to go over the chasm as it exists. If we propose to remedy the existing things before now, to change the laws that exist, we may be embarrassed by it.

So I think it would be an act of wisdom to just let the law of 1888 and all the laws on the Chinese question stand as they are until Congress, with more deliberation than it can now have, may take up the subject and either take away some of the stringent provisions of existing law or modify them in some way, or negotiate a new treaty. But now we are under the present spur of the moment, and we have to pass this bill in some form to continue existing laws in order to prevent the income of a great mass of population which all of us agree ought not to come.

That is my position, although it may be not entirely consistent with my course, because I have been opposed to the Scott law all along, especially when it was introduced at a time when we might have made a treaty. Under the circumstances I am not disposed to embarrass our friends on the Pacific coast by any change of existing law, but would simply continue the laws as they stand, good, bad, and indifferent, until Congress may at its proper leisure take up the subject calmly and consider it deliberately.

Mr. FELTON. Mr. President, I have no desire to discuss this amendment, but I do desire to correct what I deem to be a false impression from the remarks of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT]. I undertake to say that the census is in no wise a correct enumeration of the Chinese population within the United States. For instance, in the city of San Francisco alone it is well understood by the police at their headquarters that there are between 35,000 and 36,000 Chinese within the city, while the census gives less than 25,000. We in the West who are conversant with these people and their way of doing things know of their evasions of laws before, and we know that it is not in accordance with their theories, their aims, their ambitions, and their interests to give a proper enumeration of them. Whenever they can evade it, I desire to assure the Senate they will do it, and have done it.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, I hope this amendment will not prevail. The Senate Committee on Foreign Relations concluded after a fair deliberation to report a bill extending all existing laws, including the Scott law. Whatever changes that law made in the treaty have been acquiesced in virtually by China. Our diplomatic and other relations have continued substantially unimpaired. The most important objection to the Scott law was the fact that it cancelled the certificates of Chinese laborers who were out of the country holding certificates entitling them to return. Undoubtedly most of the Chinamen whose certificates were cancelled have entered into other employment, and probably not many of them would desire to return again to the United States. But to repeal the Scott law would change the existing status and allow Chinese laborers to go abroad with certificates entitling them to return and open the door again to the admission of any number of Chinese laborers.

Mr. GRAY. I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon before he takes his seat whether the law as it existed prior to the enactment of what is called the Scott law was confined, in its permission to Chinese laborers to go abroad and come back again, to those who were in the country at the date of the treaty, that is, November, 1880?

Mr. DOLPH. I am not prepared now without an examination of the treaty to state.

Mr. GRAY. That is true, I think.

Mr. DOLPH. I do not know whether it extended to Chinese laborers who came in afterwards or applied only to those who were here at the date of the treaty, but if the Senator is correct that will only make the argument made by me all the stronger.

Mr. GRAY. So that the Scott law in effect merely took away from all laborers, whether they were here at the time of the treaty or subsequently came, the right to go and return.

Mr. DOLPH. It took away the right to return from those already abroad. The worst feature of it, if I may be allowed to use the expression, the most objectionable feature to anyone who opposed the law would be the fact that it cancelled outstanding certificates and prevented the return of those who had been once here and gone back with the understanding that under the treaty and existing laws they could return and had certificates entitling them to return.

Mr. GRAY. That is the fact.

Mr. DOLPH. But we could not make any adequate restitution by the repeal of the Scott law, and I do not think it advisable to disturb existing laws.

Mr. GRAY. That may be, but a repeal of the Scott law would only in that view bring about this state of things, that no Chinese laborer who is here now could go back to China and return unless he had been here in November, 1880.

Mr. DOLPH. That is possibly true.

Mr. GRAY. And that would confine the right of going and returning to, I suppose, a very small class of Chinese laborers.

Mr. STEWART. That is, if the law could be executed.

Mr. GRAY. If the law could be executed.

Mr. STEWART. You can not pick them out.

Mr. GRAY. That is another phase of it.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I shall vote with the committee against this proposed amendment, although in my view of the state of the law and of the proposed legislation it does not make very much difference whether the amendment is adopted or not. My impression is that even if the amendment were adopted the Scott law would stand all the same forever, until it was repealed. I do not think the amendment as proposed by the Senator from Connecticut would operate as a repeal of what is known as the Scott law.

The Scott law, as I understand it, is an independent act, although it says something in the title about being supplementary. At the same time I do not think the Scott exclusion act expires with the acts of 1882 and 1884. I think they might expire and the Scott exclusion act would remain and continue on. There may be a question, however, in that view of the case as to whether the amendment proposed by the committee would not operate as a limitation upon the existence of the Scott act, making what is a perpetual act as it stands now an act that would only be vital for ten years. But taking it altogether, I shall risk the position of the committee and vote against the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. DOLPH. I will state to my colleague if he has any fears that the Scott law was a continuing act it would limit it to insert after the words "descent" the words "shall expire by their own limitation," and confine this extension to those acts which expire by their own limitation.

Mr. MITCHELL. That would do very well, but that would still leave open the question, if it should turn out that I am wrong in my opinion that the Scott law is permanent.

Mr. DOLPH. This would extend the Scott law, because it would expire then by its own limitation or by being limited by reference to another act.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think it is in pretty good shape the way the committee has fixed, if we simply intend to extend the existing law.

Mr. DOLPH. I am inclined to think myself that the Scott law falls with the other, being built upon it as a supplementary act.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have the Scott law read if the Senator has it.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have it here. It is short.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let it be read at the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The law of 1888 will be read. The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc. That from and after the passage of this act it shall be unlawful for any Chinese laborer who shall at any time heretofore have been, or who may now or hereafter be, a resident within the United States, and who shall have departed, or shall depart therefrom, and shall not have returned before the passage of this act, to return to, or remain in, the United States.

Sec. 2. That no certificates of identity provided for in the fourth and fifth sections of the act to which this is a supplement shall hereafter be issued; and every certificate heretofore issued in pursuance thereof is hereby declared void and of no effect, and the Chinese laborer claiming admission by virtue thereof shall not be permitted to enter the United States.

Sec. 3. That all the duties prescribed, liabilities, penalties, and forfeitures imposed, and the powers conferred by the second, tenth, eleventh, and, twelfth sections of the act to which this is a supplement are hereby extended and made applicable to the provisions of this act.

Sec. 4. That all such part or parts of the act to which this is a supplement as are inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

Approved, October 1, 1888.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I shall vote for this amendment without regard to the effect it may have upon what is called the Scott law, for the reason that the Scott law was passed under circumstances very peculiar and which I have not heard lately any man approve. It was passed by both Houses of Congress almost in a single day. It passed the other House without being referred to a committee upon the day it was introduced there. It was passed very soon afterwards by the Senate, without reference to any committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. Within three days.

Mr. DAWES. It was enacted in the face of a treaty in which we had covenanted that those Chinese who had already come to this country under the encouragement of the treaty stipulations might go and come and remain as citizens of the United States are permitted to go and come and remain. Instantly, without a single hour's warning, every one of those Chinamen who had gone abroad under this stipulation had the gates shut down between him and this country and all they had here that would induce them to remain here or come here for any purpose, except a few. A man might come if he had a wife and a child, and there were one or two other such exceptions; but without the slightest warning to all others who went on the faith of a treaty abroad that stipulated they might return we passed that law that they should never come back to this country. We passed it under such circumstances which could never, it appears to me, meet the approval of Congress again.

The question comes up here to-day under calmer times and when reason seems for this time and on this subject to have some sway, and yet we are asked to-day to approve of that proceeding. Four years after it has passed Congress, looking back upon it, Senators have been free to say that their participation in it they regret exceedingly, and yet we are asked to reaffirm what we did then. We see now that if we had not done it the way would have been clear for a reasonable and stringent, if you may say, law sufficient, and a treaty stipulation sufficient to exclude all such Chinamen whose presence would be injurious here.

I am ready to go as far as anyone in the enactment in accordance with treaty stipulations of any law that shall exclude any Chinaman or anyone of any other nation whose presence here is injurious to our society or our institutions. I am ready to cooperate in an effort to make treaty stipulations with China or any other nation; but I am not ready now, looking back for four years and recollecting the circumstances under which that law was passed, to reaffirm, as the bill in its present shape does, all that was done then, and stamp it with the approval of to-day.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I voted for the Scott law and I shall vote for it again. I do not choose to be put in the rôle of those who are in a penitential mood over that transaction. I voted for it, as I have voted for all laws which I believed would prevent a Mongolian inundation on the Pacific Slope or any other portion of this country. I voted for it as I am willing to vote for any law that will prevent so great a calamity to this country.

The Chinese are sui generis emphatically. They do not belong to the general category of immigrants into this country. They do not assimilate with the American people. To use a better word, they do not homologate with our people at all. They are political parasites. They do not come here for the purpose of assisting in working out the great problem of American republican government upon this continent.

My conscience has never been lacerated and torn by any legislation doing away with the treaty when self-preservation demanded that we should take immediate action to protect our own people. The Supreme Court of the United States has time and again decided that Congress had the right by an act of both Houses, approved by the President, to do away with any treaty. While I hold this opinion, I am convinced that the Scott law has worked well and there is now no imminent and overwhelming danger of an inundation of Asiatics upon the Pacific Slope of this country.

I have voted to sustain the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations exactly as I would vote anywhere else as a legislator when the principal argument against an existing law was that it had not been enforced. What would be thought of the legislator who had assisted in passing a law for punishment by imprisonment in the penitentiary for ten years when he was told that that penalty ought to be changed into a death penalty because the ten years in the penitentiary could not be enforced? If the Scott law is not strictly enforced it is the fault of administration. The law, if enforced, is ample; and if it is enforced partially, as it has been, there has been no tremendous increase of Asiatics upon the Pacific Slope, as has been alleged here in this debate.

But more than that, Mr. President, if the words of the late minister to China, John Russell Young, just published in the North American Review, are true, then we should go no further in this direction than is absolutely necessary for the protection of our own people. I have supported the Committee on Foreign Relations because I believed that we had already a remedy sufficient in existing law to prevent this great evil of which I have spoken, and I did not think it proper to go further and needlessly and ruthlessly offend the Chinese Government when it did not become necessary for the protection of our own people. As a matter of justice, however, if Mr. Young is a credible witness, the Chinese Government is not to blame for any amount of immigration to the soil of the United States of their people. He says:

The Chinese are blamed for what is our own fault. We denounce the Chinese Government for the immigration of Chinese and overlook the fact that this immigration is from an English port and under the English flag, and that China has no more control over it than over the immigration of Irishmen from Londonderry.

If that assertion be true, coming from our late minister to China, we should be careful not to insult or outrage the sentiment of the people of China or the Government of China one hair's breadth further than is absolutely necessary to exercise the right of self-preservation for our own people.

I am willing, if I believed it was necessary, to go as far as any Senator from the Pacific Slope to protect the people of this country from this inundation of Chinese. In the Southern States we have seen the ruinous effect of taking a people unprepared for citizenship who knew nothing about making laws and suddenly lifting them into the sphere of determining the destiny of the people of the United States. We have seen there the ruinous effect of such experiments, and with the humble negro, who assimilates himself with us in our institutions, who is essentially imitative in everything, to go further and take a people who can never become Americans, who can never be anything else but political parasites, and to enable them to flood this country to such an extent as either in labor or society or political affairs to exercise any material influence shall never come about by any vote of mine.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I shall vote for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut. These general terms are very eloquent, but shall we adopt a rule that nobody shall come to the United States who does not homologate with our people, as the Senator from Missouri says? How many hundreds of thousands of people are there who come here who have no sympathy with free institutions? How can you apply these doctrines? If it be said that the Chinese are incapable of improvement, upon what data does the Senator from Missouri found that proposition? They are among the most civilized people of the country, from whom we have derived, as I have shown, many of our most valuable discoveries and inventions.

Mr. President, let us have something practical. There is no trouble in any State excluding every Chinaman. There is no trouble in having a treaty made that will enable them to do it. There is no reasonable danger of any overflow in this country by the Mongolians. But if there were a million of them here the people of this country are capable of holding them in subjection and of keeping them from containing any control or domination. We are capable of establishing systems of labor that will prevent them from competing injuriously with our country. There is no trouble in keeping the Chinese out of this country or out of any State without resorting to these harsh and unreasonable provisions.

Mr. SANDERS. Mr. President, in some observations which I made Saturday upon a condition of affairs found by a joint committee of the two Houses of Congress to exist in San Francisco, I took occasion to condemn that condition of affairs as being unworthy of any judicial tribunal. I did express the opinion that it did not continue. It was said that complaints being made by Chinese persons that they were unlawfully detained, writs of habeas corpus were issued by the courts, and when upon an inquiry as to whether they were lawfully or unlawfully detained, it was adjudged that they were lawfully in custody, not 5 per cent of them could be found to be returned to the custody from which they were taken by the writ. I expressed a belief that that condition of things did not continue, and I rose simply to say that I am reliably informed from San Francisco by parties in a situation to know that no such condition of affairs to-day exists. The courts in that city refuse to accept Chinese bail, for they have found it to be worthless, and as a result of enforcing the law in that spirit the number of habeas corpus cases has diminished from 7,000 in the year 1888 to 2 within the last six months.

Mr. DOLPH. Two cases or 2,000 cases?

Mr. SANDERS. Two cases.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. PLATT. On that let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. President, if this were a question of the exclusion of immigrants in the ordinary sense of the term, men who come to the United States with their wives and children and assume the responsibility which belongs to civilized manhood, I should hesitate. But I understand from all I have heard that this is an invasion of Chinese men, who come into the country for their own temporary purposes, and in the nature of things they do not assume the ordinary burdens and responsibilities of manhood, and they can much more easily elude a law passed for their exclusion.

I see no reason why we should not exclude the Chinese men who come into this country and assume none of the duties not of citizenship alone, but none of the duties of manhood, who do not intend to remain, but who come to earn what they may rightfully earn and then return to their own country. I see no difficulty in excluding them; and when we keep within the limits of legal justice and charity I am in favor of the most rigorous laws. The distinction is a very wide one between immigration and the mere migration of these herds of laborers.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, I have never found any difficulty in gaining my own consent to vote for any measure of exclusion of the Chinese that seemed to be necessary by the condition of things on the Pacific coast where they most abound. I do not believe that it accords with the best interests of that people or any other people to introduce an alien race among them, nor a labor element that will come in competition with the American laborer who performs work on such different principles and surrounded by essentially different conditions.

I therefore have voted, as the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] said he has voted, for every measure of Chinese exclusion that has come before the Senate since I have been a member of it. But I shall vote for the Senate substitute and against the House bill because I do not believe that any exigency which would warrant the harshness of the provisions of the House bill exists on the Pacific coast. There has been no evidence produced either in the Senate or before the committees to which the bill has been referred—certainly none before the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate—to show that any condition exists on the Pacific coast which demands the enactment of a stronger measure of exclusion than we already have.

I did not understand the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] to cite any evidence to the effect that the present laws of exclusion do not operate to substantially prevent any ingress of Chinese within our borders. The condition of things which he cited from a newspaper as existing in San Francisco is deplorable enough, but it exists by reason of the presence of Chinese who are already there, and I do not understand that he even said that that was increased by the importation of Chinese at the present time or that the present laws do not sufficiently exclude them.

But I can not vote, although I thought at first I might be able to do it, for the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut, because I can see that there are difficulties of administration in regard to the law existing prior to the law of 1888 which might create a grievance of which the people on the Pacific coast would have a right to complain. I shall feel compelled to vote against that amendment and by my vote seek to establish and continue the present condition of statute law in that regard.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] demands the yeas and nays on agreeing to the amendment submitted by him.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COLQUITT (when Mr. BUTLER's name was called). The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] is paired with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON]. I am authorized to state that if the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] were present and unpaired he would vote in the affirmative upon this question.

Mr. CASEY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO]. As I do not know how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. DAVIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE]. If he were present I should vote "yea."

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (when Mr. MANDERSON's name was called). The occupant of the Chair is paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN].

Mr. MILLS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

Mr. POWER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. WHITE]. If he were present I should vote "nay."

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CHANDLER. In section 4, line 2, I move to strike out the word "once;" in line 3, after the words "United States," to insert "shall be imprisoned at hard labor for a period of not exceeding six months, and thereafter removed from the United States as hereinbefore provided, and any such Chinese person or person of Chinese descent having been once so convicted," and, in line 7, to strike out "six months" and insert "one year."

Mr. BUTLER. How will the clause then read?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The section will be read as proposed to be amended.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend the section so as to read:

That any such Chinese person or person of Chinese descent convicted and adjudged to be not lawfully entitled to be or remain in the United States shall be imprisoned at hard labor for a period of not exceeding six months and thereafter removed from the United States as hereinbefore provided, and any such Chinese person or person of Chinese descent having been once so convicted and having been once so removed from the United States in pursuance of such conviction, who shall be subsequently convicted for a like offense, shall be imprisoned at hard labor for a period of not exceeding one year, and thereafter removed from the United States, as hereinbefore provided.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendments to the section proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER], which question will be taken in gross unless there be objection.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire if he thinks that a Chinese laborer having once come to the United States and having been convicted here for being here, and imprisoned six months at hard labor, would be likely to come back again after he had been removed from the United States?

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senate committee seemed to think that a second coming was possible. Senators will notice that the original House bill, section 7, provides that any Chinese person coming here contrary to law "shall be imprisoned in a penitentiary for a term of not exceeding five years, and at the expiration of such term of imprisonment be removed from the United States to the country whence he came." The Senate provision is only for imprisoning a Chinaman unlawfully coming here on a second conviction. It has been already developed in this debate that the deportation of Chinamen who come here unlawfully, without imprisoning them, does not deter them from coming.

Now, this is merely a question of adequate penalty. We pass this proposed law. We exclude these Chinamen, and they know they have no right to come here. If they come here there ought to be an adequate penalty to punish them for coming. The penalty of deportation is not sufficient, for our experience has shown that they come here just the same. If they come across the border and are sent back across the border they come again.

The universal judgment, I think, of Senators from the Pacific coast and others who are familiar with this subject and desire a rigid and stringent enforcement of the existing law is that there should be a penalty of imprisonment upon the first conviction of a Chinaman for coming here contrary to law. I do not ask that there shall be a five years' imprisonment, but I submit that if the law is to be effectually enforced there should be some imprisonment, no matter how short, for coming here contrary to law.

Mr. FELTON. I hope we shall have a vote upon the pending question, because I desire to offer an amendment which I think is important. The time is getting late, and I desire to have it acted upon to-night.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. FELTON. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert after line 6, at the end of the first section:

And that it shall be the duty of all Chinese persons, except diplomatic and other officers and their body and household servants, within the limits of the United States at the time of the passage of this act to apply for and obtain from the collectors of internal revenue in their respective districts, within one year after the passage of this act, certificates of residence; and any such Chinese person within the limits of the United States who shall fail or refuse to comply with the provisions of this act, or who, within one year after the passage hereof, shall be found without such certificate of residence, shall be adjudged by the court before whom he may be brought as being unlawfully within the limits of the United States, and shall be subject to the same fines and penalties as if he had unlawfully come into the United States in the first instance as in this act provided.

That immediately after the passage of this act the Secretary of the Treasury shall make rules and regulations and prescribe the necessary forms to enable the Treasury Department to issue the certificates required hereby. Such certificates may be issued by the collector or deputy collector of internal revenue nearest the place where such Chinese resides. The certificate shall contain a true photographic copy of the applicant, together with his name, age, local residence, and occupation, and a duplicate of the same shall be retained in the office of said collector of internal revenue. That in the case of the loss or destruction, proven to be without the fault of any Chinese, of his certificate of residence issued to him, a duplicate may be issued to him under rules and regulations which may be prescribed by said Secretary of the Treasury.

That the Secretary of the Treasury may appoint additional deputy collectors for the purpose of enforcing this section, and the sum of $100,000 is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated to carry out the provisions of this section. And it shall be the duty of all Chinese persons, except diplomatic and consular officers entitled to come and remain in the United States, upon entering the United States, to apply for and obtain from the collector of customs of the port at which they enter like certificates, showing their right to remain in the United States; and immediately after the passage of this act the Secretary of the Treasury shall make the necessary rules and regulations to enable collectors of customs to issue such certificates.

Mr. DOLPH. I wish to say to the Senator from California that in hearing the amendment read, I think he has made a mistake in providing that if the Chinaman be found here within one year after the passage of the act without the certificate, he shall be arrested. I think what the Senator intended to say is, that if he be found after the expiration of one year he shall be arrested.

Mr. FELTON. That was my intention.

Mr. DOLPH. I ask that the amendment be so modified.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The modification will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the ninth line strike out the word "within" and insert the words "at the expiration of;" so as to read:

And any such Chinese person within the limits of the United States who shall fail or refuse to comply with the provisions of this act, or who, at the expiration of one year after the passage hereof, etc.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from California as modified.

Mr. FELTON. Mr. President, I have offered the amendment for the purpose, as I believe, of making the present law, the Scott law, operative wherein it is now inoperative. There is no provision in that law which at all prevents the incoming of Chinese across our frontier. They come to the countries adjoining us, pass over the border, and the instant that they are here it is very difficult, almost impossible, to distinguish one from another. If this amendment should pass the result would be that within the time prescribed all Chinamen entitled to remain in this country would have a certificate or a passport practically showing that fact. If one were found without it that one might be distinguished and suffer the penalties of the law.

I think this would be no hardship upon these people. Our own people are required to register for other purposes. There is no imputation upon these people, nothing against their rights, so long as they are here, as I see it, and if they are simply honest it will prevent collusion between them and the others coming in. I am unable to see that it is a violation of the present law or of any treaty obligation in relation to the matter. The facts remain that the borders are utterly without any law to prevent the incoming of these people. The treaty provides that the laborers are not entitled to come in any more. I should like very much to see the amendment passed.

In this connection I desire to say that the Senator from New York [Mr. HISCOCK], able and distinguished as he is, has, in my opinion, an entirely wrong view in regard to the present law being sufficient for this purpose. The Senator is of the opinion that we of the Pacific coast by enforcing the law would be enabled to exclude all Chinese who were not entitled to remain in the country. In order to do this we would select, for instance, some one person and we would arraign him, believing that he was not entitled to be here. He would immediately swear that he was entitled, that he had been here ten years, and he could get any quantity of his countrymen to indorse that proposition.

What gentleman upon this coast can not understand is the fact that the Chinese have no morals, no regard whatever for the sanctity of an oath. With them the end justifies the means, and the end is to come in here and possess themselves of what we have and return to their own country with it, and let another herd come and take their place.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. President, I regret extremely if under this bill, in the event of its passage, California should find itself unable to have it executed; but is there danger of that? As I understand, section 13 of the law will be in force, and it provides:

That any Chinese person, or person of Chinese descent, found unlawfully in the United States, or its Territories, may be arrested upon a warrant issued upon a complaint, under oath, filed by any party on behalf of the United States, by any justice, judge, or commissioner of any United States court.

He has a summary trial there.

Mr. FELTON. How are you going to identify him?

Mr. HISCOCK. He has to identify himself. I answer the Senator, and I have but five minutes, that he is compelled to identify himself. He is compelled to prove that twelve years ago, when the treaty of 1880 was negotiated, he was here; that he came in here lawfully; that he had a right to be here, and that he has not been home and returned since.

If these people have reached that stage of morals that you have described—and I do not doubt it, I am not questioning it—I see it is advertised, and they are exhibited in the California papers which are read here, as an attraction, I suppose, to visit the city of San Francisco, and I have been told that they are under police espionage, and strangers are conducted through these dives and places to see them as the greatest living curiosities there, rather than to be punished for violation of the law. I do not undertake to say that these things are true, but if they are in that state of degradation that you have described, what one of your justices, what one of your judges, what one of your officers there will believe them? They will require to have something besides Chinese evidence to establish their identity.

The burden of proof is upon them to do it, and if a whole battalion of Chinamen might advance and swear that they knew that a man was there twelve years ago and entitled to a domicile in the United States it would have no effect whatever on the judicial mind of a judicial officer in the judicial State of California. As is suggested by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], the accusation that the law can not be enforced is an arraignment of the whole judiciary system of the country. I have seen, and so have you, Mr. President, a dozen men go upon the stand, so degraded that they were not entitled to credit, and, with their evidence all one way, the jury finding a verdict the other and the judge sustain it. This evidence is to be weighed, and to be weighed by men, if they are human, prejudiced against these people.

Mr. FELTON. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from California to the fact that he has spoken once on this amendment.

Mr. HISCOCK. If I have any time left, I will yield it to the Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not understand that that can be done under the rule. The Senator from California can proceed by unanimous consent.

Mr. FRYE. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from California be permitted to proceed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the Senator will proceed.

Mr. FELTON. Only one word, Mr. President. If, as the Senator from New York said, there shall be no justice in any court whatever and a Chinese oath is not to be taken under any circumstances, then I will grant that the Senator's position is correct, but not otherwise.

Mr. STEWART. The Chinese are the only witnesses that can be found under such circumstances, and under the civil rights act they are permitted to testify.

I have had some experience in relation to Chinese testimony. About forty years ago I was the district attorney of Nevada County, Cal., and tried the first murder case in which Chinese testimony was used. I labored very hard to ascertain what regard Chinamen had for an oath. A Chinese missionary, Rev. Mr. Speer, who had been in China for a long time, was then living in San Francisco, and was familiar with them. I sent for him, and the board of supervisors made an appropriation to send for everybody who knew anything about the matter. There were a large number of people there who had lived in China, and they came to attend the trial. The question was how an oath could be administered. Some stated that it was the habit to administer it by cutting off a chicken's head, others that it was by burning papers, and various other devices were suggested.

We tried them all in order that there might not be any mistake about it. We thought we would get the truth out of the Chinese witnesses by separating them, and so we hired rooms in different parts of the town, kept them separately, and brought them in separately; but when they came in each one of them told precisely the same story in exactly the same language. [Laughter.]

Mr. ALLISON. Did they tell the truth?

Mr. STEWART. They did not; but they told the same story in exactly the same language, and they had undoubtedly made up their stories before they came there. On further investigation we found that in China they were in the habit of using some torture to make witnesses tell the truth; and whenever a crime was committed there the witnesses were in the habit of getting together and all telling the same story; so that if they should kill or torture one they should have to kill or torture all of them. That was the general mode they had.

I spent several months over this question, and finally I took it up to the Supreme Court. There was no objection taken in the court below except as to the difference in the names, Kong-Wing, and Ching-Chee, and all these Chinese names. I convicted my man and went to the Supreme Court with great confidence. The statute required that there should be exceptions taken. None had been taken. I argued the case for the State and Gen. McConnell was on the other side. He made a very learned argument against Chinese evidence and undertook to show that the Chinamen were the same as the Indians and then used the statutes against Indians testifying against a white man, and to my astonishment the Supreme Court held that a Chinaman was an Indian, and could not testify against a white man in the State of California. [Laughter.]

Having had this experience with them, I have observed their testimony in the courts of San Francisco and on the Pacific coast generally. There have been five or six thousand of these cases, and the Chinamen all come in and tell the same story. They have one man bailed out and substitute another for him and play all sorts of games on the courts.

Because you have got a law if you think it practicable that you can remove a Chinaman who is improperly here, if you think you can get one out of one hundred thousand of them in twenty years and make a case to extradite him, then I shall be disappointed. I do not believe it can be done. A white man, a stranger, can not tell Chinamen apart. They will substitute one for another right before your eyes and then go right on with the case. [Laughter.] They understand all these games to such a degree that the men who lecture on sleight of hand would have no chance with them. They would play in court a game that no lecturer on sleight of hand ever dreamed of as far as that was concerned. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Nevada has expired. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from California [Mr. FELTON].

Mr. MITCHELL. I can only see one objection to this amendment. The effect of this amendment, if adopted, will be, I presume, to legalize—if that is the proper word—the remaining here of all Chinamen who shall take out a certificate in a year, whether they are lawfully here or not. I do not know that there is any other way out of it, but it will have that effect. It was the opinion of Judge Field, which I read the other day, that at least two-thirds of all who were here five years ago came here unlawfully, in violation of the law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from California. [Putting the question.] The yeas seem to have it.

Mr. FELTON. I should like to have a division on the amendment.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, it seems to me evident that we are not going to dispose of this bill this evening.

Several SENATORS. Oh, yes.

Mr. HARRIS. I have no further remark to make.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California asks for a division on his amendment.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 12—

Mr. FELTON. I withdraw the demand for a division. I am satisfied.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The demand for a division is withdrawn, and the amendment is rejected.

Mr. FELTON. I intended to offer one other amendment, which, in my simplicity, I thought very important in this case, but I rather think that I understand the temper of the Senate, and I have no desire to delay the matter further, so I shall not offer the amendment.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to prohibit the coming of Chinese persons into the United States."

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendment and ask a conference with the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. DOLPH, Mr. DAVIS, and Mr. BUTLER were appointed.

Mr. TARSNEY. Yes, sir; and all of these were delivered before the change in the policy of the Department was communicated to the contractors.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

PROPOSED CORRECTION OF THE RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the resolution that came over on Saturday from the Committee on Printing, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House, deeming it a high duty that the courtesy and decorum required by parliamentary law and practice should characterize debate, and the conduct of members at all times in their official relations, hereby expresses its disapproval of the unparliamentary language used by Hon. JOSEPH H. WALKER, a Representative from the State of Massachusetts, in that portion of his speech printed in the RECORD on the 17th instant, but which was not delivered on the floor. And considering it impracticable to separate the unparliamentary portions of said speech from such parts thereof as may be parliamentary: Therefore,

Be it further resolved, That the Public Printer be directed to exclude from the permanent CONGRESSIONAL RECORD all of that portion of his speech beginning with the words, "Hot shot for Mugwumps—HOAT and WILLIAMS shown up," etc., on page 2259 of the daily RECORD down to and including the paragraph on page 2261, which closes with the words "but the earmarks are on it," near the bottom of the first column on said page 2261.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] moved on Saturday to lay this resolution on the table, and on that motion the yeas and nays were ordered; but on taking the vote a quorum failed to appear. As many as favor laying this resolution on the table will, when their names are called, say "aye;" those opposed, "no." The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken: and there were—yeas 6, nays 139, not voting 183: as follows:

YEAS—6.
Bowers.	English.	Owens.	Warwick.
Dungan.	Haynes, Ohio
NAYS—139.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, and the names of members marked as absent will be called for excuses.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, I was present. I did not answer because I did not hear my name.

Mr. LANHAM. I was present.

The SPEAKER. The names of the absentees will be called, and gentlemen can answer on that call. During the calling of the names of absentees excuses may be offered.

Mr. COGSWELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire it to appear in the RECORD that my colleague [Mr. MORSE] is absent, sick, by leave of the House.

Mr. DOCKERY (when the name of Mr. FYAN was called). I ask that my colleague [Mr. FYAN] be excused on account of illness.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that the gentleman from Missouri is absent by leave of the House.

Mr. TAYLOR of Illinois (when the name of Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois was called). My colleague [Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois] is at home on his farm, looking after his fences. I understand he has leave, but I am not sure of it; and if he has not, I ask that he be excused.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that the gentleman from Illinois has leave of absence.

Mr. DOCKERY (when the name of Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa was called). The gentleman from Iowa is absent on account of sickness. I was to have secured leave of absence for him on Saturday last. I am not sure whether that was done, and if not I desire to have him excused on account of sickness.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa has leave of absence.

Mr. STOCKDALE (when the name of Mr. KYLE was called). I ask leave of absence for my colleague [Mr. KYLE].

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. HERMANN (when the name of Mr. LESTER of Georgia was called). Mr. Speaker, I ask that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LESTER] be excused. He was required to go home on important business, and I have paired with him in the mean time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia is absent by leave of the House.

Mr. CASTLE. I ask that my colleague from Minnesota [Mr. HARRIES] be excused on account of sickness.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. LANHAM (when the name of Mr. STEWART of Texas was called). Mr. Speaker, I ask that my colleague [Mr. STEWART of Texas] be excused. I suppose he is sick. He has been in ill health for some time.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The call of the names of absentees for excuses was concluded. The SPEAKER. The absentees have been noted. What is the pleasure of the House?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I offer the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey. Before that is offered I desire to ask that my colleague [Mr. BERGEN] be excused. I understand he went to his home on Saturday evening, and his train will not arrive for twenty minutes.

Mr. RICHARDSON. For what reason?

Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey. His train does not get in for about twenty minutes, but he will be here as soon as it arrives.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN] that his colleague be excused. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, does the call of the House disclose a quorum?

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Then why not proceed with the regular order?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee is offering a resolution.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Is that the regular order?

The SPEAKER. It is in order. The House has the right to bring every member here if it desires.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Notwithstanding a quorum is present?

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposes the House desires to get a voting quorum.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms take into custody and bring to the bar of the House such of its members as are now absent without leave of the House.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask that my colleague [Mr. MAGNER] be excused on account of sickness.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I ask that my colleague [Mr. CRAIN of Texas] be excused. I know that he has not been well, and I ask that he be excused on account of sickness.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. BUSHNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask that my colleague [Mr. BABBITT] be excused. He has been sick for some days. He has partially recovered, but has not been able to be here.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that the gentleman is absent by leave of the House.

Mr. JOHNSON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CABLE] be excused. He has been detained in New York on important business.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I wish to inquire of the Chair whether, under the rules of the House and under constitutional provisions, it is competent for the House to send for and compel the attendance of absent members except in case where it is developed that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that the House would have the right to have every member present; that if but one or two members were absent it could send for them if it should desire.

Mr. BOUTELLE. But while there is a positive rule and a positive constitutional provision for sending for members "in the absence of a quorum," I do not know of any rule for sending for members when the presence of a quorum is disclosed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will bear in mind that the Constitution does not say that it is limited to the condition when the House finds itself without a quorum. It says fifteen members, including the Speaker, may send for members.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I beg the Speaker's pardon, but I think that invariably has been held to be operative in the absence of a quorum and to compel the attendance of a quorum. I also beg to call the attention of the Speaker, and I am doing it for the purpose of obtaining information, as I do not make any pretensions to be an expert in parliamentary law—as I understand it, there is a rule in our Manual that provides distinctly (clause 2 of Rule XVII) that where the Speaker is required to count to ascertain a quorum, after the previous question is ordered, and he finds that a quorum is present, then a call of the House can not be had; and by a parity of reasoning it seems to me that the House under similar circumstances and under our present rules would not have authority to send for absentees when there is no authority under such circumstances to have a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not looked specially to ascertain what the practice has been, but in the opinion of the Chair it is in the power of the House to require the attendance of absent members.

Mr. BOUTELLE. My impression is, Mr. Speaker, that that power is confined to the case of there being no quorum present. I think the only authority to send for absent members is conferred in cases where there is a lack of a quorum, but in that I may be wrong.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, in reply to the gentleman from Maine I beg to observe that if his contention were correct it might bring about a state of affairs where legislation would be impossible. If it were not in the power of the House to send for absentees even when there was a quorum present, legislation might be brought to a standstill. There is largely more than a quorum present at this time, but, as my friend from Maine knows, a portion of the members present are not voting, and if his position were correct all that would be necessary would be to get a quorum here and then for a portion of those present to abstain from voting, and the wheels of legislation could be blocked without limit; for you could prevent sending for those who would, if here, vote.

Mr. OATES. If my friend from Tennessee will permit me, I will suggest that there are certain measures which, under the Constitution, can not be passed by a quorum, and that point alone would seem to show that the House certainly has the power to bring in all absent members.

Mr. McMILLIN. I thank my friend for the suggestion. If the position of the gentleman from Maine were correct, then we might have at any time a state of affairs where, while there was an actual quorum present, it would not be possible for the House to come to a vote on any proposition of the class named by my friend from Alabama, such as voting on vetoes, etc.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that a fair interpretation of the Constitution and the rules in relation to this point would be this: Without the provision in the Constitution to which the gentleman from Maine has referred a less number of members than a quorum could not send for absentees, but, by virtue of this provision, fifteen members, including the Speaker, may send and bring in absentees.

The Constitution also provides that each House may make rules for its proceeding, and the House may make a rule or order which would require the attendance of every member, even though there was a quorum present.
